The average American, like the average man of any country, has but little imagination. People who speak a different language, or worship some other god, or wear clothing unlike his own, are beyond the horizon of his sympathy. He cares but little or nothing for the sufferings or misfortunes of those who are of a different complexion or of another race. His imagination is not powerful enough to recognize the human being, in spite of peculiarities. Instead of this he looks upon every difference as an evidence of inferiority, and for the inferior he has but little if any feeling. If these "inferior people" claim equal rights he feels insulted, and for the purpose of establishing his own superiority tramples on the rights of the so-called inferior.

In our own country the native has always considered himself as much better than the immigrant, and as far superior to all people of a different complexion. At one time our people hated the Irish, then the Germans, then the Italians, and now the Chinese. The Irish and Germans, however, became numerous. They became citizens, and, most important of all, they had votes. They combined, became powerful, and the political parties sought their aid. They had something to give in exchange for protection—in exchange for political rights. In consequence of this they were flattered by candidates, praised by the political press, and became powerful enough not only to protect themselves but at last to govern the principal cities in the United States. As a matter of fact the Irish and Germans drove the native Americans out of the trades and from the lower forms of labor. They built the railways and canals. They became servants. Afterwards the Irish and the Germans were driven from the canals and railways by the Italians.

The Irish and Germans improved their condition. They went into other businesses, into the higher and more lucrative trades. They entered the professions, turned their attention to politics, became merchants, brokers, and professors in colleges. They are not now building railroads or digging on public works. They are contractors, legislators, holders of office, and the Italians and Chinese are doing the old work.

If matters had been allowed to work in the natural way, without the interference of mobs or legislators, the Chinese would have driven the Italians to better employments, and all menial labor would, in time, be done by the Mongolians.

In olden times each nation hated all others. This was considered natural and patriotic. Spain, after many centuries of war, expelled the Moors, then the Moriscos, and then the Jews. And Spain, in the name of religion and patriotism, succeeded in driving from its territory its industry, its taste and its intelligence, and by these mistakes became poor, ignorant and weak. France started on the same path when the Huguenots were expelled, and even England at one time deported the Jews. In those days a difference of race or religion was sufficient to justify any absurdity and any cruelty.

In our country, as a matter of fact, there is but little prejudice against emigrants coming from Europe, except among naturalized citizens; but nearly all foreign-born citizens are united in their prejudice against the Chinese. The truth is that the Chinese came to this country by invitation. . . .

These Chinese laborers are inoffensive, peaceable, and law-abiding. They are honest, keeping their contracts, doing as they agree. They are exceedingly industrious, always ready to work, and always giving satisfaction to their employers. They do not interfere with other people. They cannot become citizens. They have no voice in the making or in the execution of the laws. They attend to their own business. They have their own ideas, customs, religion, and ceremonies—about as foolish as our own; but they do not try to make converts nor to force their dogmas on others. They are patient, uncomplaining, stoical, and philosophical. They earn what they can, giving reasonable value for the money they receive, and as a rule, when they have amassed a few thousand dollars, they go back to their own country. They do not interfere with our ideas, our ways, or customs. They are silent workers, toiling without any object, except to do their work and get their pay. They do not establish saloons and run for Congress. Neither do they combine for the purpose of governing others. Of all the people on our soil they are the least meddlesome. Some of them smoke opium, but the opium-smoker does not beat his wife. Some of them play games of chance, but they are not members of the Stock Exchange. They eat the bread that they earn; they neither beg nor steal, but they are of no use to parties or politicians except as they become fuel to supply the flame of prejudice. They are not citizens, and they cannot vote. Their employers are about the only friends they have.

In the Pacific States the lowest became their enemies and asked for their expulsion. They denounced the Chinese and those who gave them work. The patient followers of Confucius were treated as outcasts—stoned by boys in the streets and mobbed by the fathers. Few seemed to have any respect for their rights or their feelings. They were unlike us. They wore different clothes. They dressed their hair in a peculiar way, and therefore they were beyond our sympathies. These ideas, these practices, demoralized many communities; the laboring people became cruel and the small politicians infamous. . . .

Both of the great political parties pandered to the leaders of the crusade against the Chinese for the sake of electoral votes, and in the Pacific States the friends of the Chinese were forced to keep still or to publicly speak contrary to their convictions. The orators of the "Sand Lots" were in power, and the policy of the whole country was dictated by the most ignorant and prejudiced of our citizens. Both of the great parties ratified the outrages committed by the mobs, and proceeded with alacrity to violate the treaties and solemn obligations of the government. These treaties were violated, these obligations were denied, and thousands of Chinamen were deprived of their rights, of their property, and hundreds were maimed or murdered. They were driven from their homes. They were hunted like wild beasts. All this was done in a country that sends missionaries to China to tell the benighted savages of the blessed religion of the United States.

At first a demand was made that the Chinese should be driven out, then that no others should be allowed to come, and laws with these objects in view were passed, in spite of the treaties, preventing the coming of any more. For a time that satisfied the hater of the Mongolian. Then came a demand for more stringent legislation, so that many of the Chinese already here could be compelled to leave. The answer or response to this demand is what is known as the Geary Law. . . .

If we were at war with China then we might legally consider every Chinaman as an enemy, but we were and are at peace with that country. The Geary Act was passed by Congress and signed by the President simply for the sake of votes. The Democrats in Congress voted for it to save the Pacific States to the Democratic column; and a Republican President signed it so that the Pacific States should vote the Republican ticket. Principle was forgotten, or rather it was sacrificed in the hope of political success. It was then known, as now, that China is a peaceful nation, that it does not believe in war as a remedy, that it relies on negotiation and treaty. It is also known that the Chinese in this country were helpless, without friends, without power to defend themselves. It is possible that many members of Congress voted in favor of the Act believing that the Supreme Court would hold it unconstitutional, and that in the meantime it might be politically useful. . . .

The Chinese are not driven away because there is no room for them. Our country is not crowded. There are many millions of acres waiting for the plow. There is plenty of room here under our flag for five hundred millions of people. These Chinese that we wish to oppress and imprison are people who understand the art of irrigation. They can redeem the deserts. They are the best of gardeners. They are modest and willing to occupy the lowest seats. They only ask to be day laborers, washers, and ironers. They are willing to sweep and scrub. They are good cooks. They can clear lands and build railroads. They do not ask to be masters—they wish only to serve. In every capacity they are faithful; but in this country their virtues have made enemies, and they are hated because of their patience, their honesty, and their industry.

The Geary Law, however, failed to provide the ways and means for carrying it into effect, so that the probability is it will remain a dead letter upon the statute book. The sum of money required to carry it out is too large, and the law fails to create the machinery and name the persons authorized to deport the Chinese. Neither is there any mode of trial pointed out. According to the law there need be no indictment by a Grand Jury, no trial by a jury, and the person found guilty of being here without a certificate of residence can be imprisoned and treated as a felon without the ordinary forms of trial. . . .

The Congress that passed it is the same that closed the gates of the World's Fair on the "blessed Sabbath," thinking it wicked to look at statues and pictures on that day. These representatives of the people seem to have had more piety than principle.

After the passage of such a law by the United States is it not indecent for us to send missionaries to China? Is there not work enough for them at home? We send ministers to China to convert the heathen; but when we find a Chinaman on our soil, where he can be saved by our example, we treat him as a criminal. . . .

Our government is founded on the equality of human rights—on the idea, the sacred truth, that all are entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our country is an asylum for the oppressed of all nations—of all races. Here, the government gets its power from the consent of the governed. After the abolition of slavery these great truths were not only admitted, but they found expression in our Constitution and laws.

Shall we now go back to barbarism?

Russia is earning the hatred of the civilized world by driving the Jews from their homes. But what can the United States say? Our mouths are closed by the Geary Law. We are in the same business. Our law is as inhuman as the order or ukase of the Czar.

Let us retrace our steps, repeal the law, and accomplish what we justly desire by civilized means. Let us treat China as we would England; and, above all, let us respect the rights of men.

R. G. INGERSOLL.

Colonel Ingersoll on Sunday Tyranny.

There has long been on the statute books of the state of New Jersey a law against Sunday fishing. In fact, it was one of the old "Blue laws" that had become practically inoperative, but last winter somebody at Trenton got it reenacted with a clause fixing the penalty at $25 instead of $1. In spite of the well-recognized fact that seventy-five per cent of the people living along the shores of the bay are dependent for their living on the trade of the anglers, a few malcontents have announced their intention to enforce this law.

Among the fishermen, on the other hand, there is a strong and growing sentiment in favor of testing the constitutionality of the law. In view of this sentiment a reporter for the New York Times called on Col. Robert G. Ingersoll and asked him if he would give his views on the subject for publication. With that peculiar twinkle of the eye which those who have heard him lecture know so well the colonel replied:

"Do you write short-hand?"

The reporter then asked the following question in long-hand: "What do you think of the religious spirit that seeks to regulate by legislation the manner in which the people of this country shall spend their Sundays?"

Colonel Ingersoll settled himself in his cushioned office chair and replied:

"The church is not willing to stand alone, not willing to base its influence on reason and on the character of its members. It seeks the aid of the state. The cross is in partnership with the sword. People should spend Sundays as they do other days; that is to say, as they please. No one has the right to do anything on Monday that interferes with the rights of his neighbors, and everyone has the right to do anything he pleases on Sunday that does not interfere with the rights of his neighbors. Sunday is the day of rest, not of religion. We are under obligation to do right on all days.

"Nothing can be more absurd than the idea that any particular space of time is sacred. Everything in nature goes on the same on Sunday as on other days, and if beyond nature there be a God, then God works on Sunday as he does on all other days. There is no rest in nature. There is perpetual activity in every possible direction. The old idea that God made the world and then rested [here the colonel chuckled softly] is idiotic. There were two reasons given to the Hebrews for keeping the Sabbath—one because Jehovah rested on that day, the other because the Hebrews were brought out of Egypt. The first reason, we know, is false, and the second reason is good only for the Hebrews. According to the Bible, Sunday, or rather the Sabbath, was not for the world, but for the Hebrews, and the Hebrews alone. Our Sunday is pagan and is the day of the sun, as Monday is the day of the moon. [Again the colonel chuckled.] All our day names are pagan. I am opposed to all Sunday legislation."

"Why should Sunday be observed otherwise than as a day of recreation?"

"Sunday is a day of recreation, or should be. A day for the laboring man to rest, a day to visit museums and libraries, a day to look at pictures, a day to visit the shore of the sea, a day for picnics, a day to get acquainted with your wife and children, a day for poetry and art, a day on which to read old letters and to meet friends, a day to cultivate the amenities of life, a day for those who live in tenelements to feel the soft grass beneath their feet. In short, Sunday should be a day of joy. The church endeavors to fill it with gloom and sadness, with stupid sermons and dyspeptic theology."

"Under a federal Constitution guaranteeing civil and religious liberty are the so-called 'blue laws' constitutional?"

"No, they are not. But the probability is that the supreme courts of most of the states would decide the other way. And yet all these laws are clearly contrary to the spirit of the federal Constitution and the constitutions of most of the states."

"Are you a fisherman, and have you ever fished on Sunday?"

"I am not a fisherman. Neither am I a hunter. Long ago I used to fish, and I have fished on Sunday, and had what is called good luck [another chuckle], though at that time to fish on Sunday was a crime. [And the colonel laughed outright.]

"I hope to live until all these foolish laws are repealed and until we are in the highest and noblest sense a free people. And by free I mean each having the right to do anything that does not interfere with the rights or with the happiness of another. I want to see the time when we live for this world and when all shall endeavor to increase, by education, by reason, and by persuasion, the sum of human happiness."

Colonel Ingersoll on New Jersey.

A knot of lawyers stood in the lobby of the New York Fifth Avenue Hotel the other day laughing over a story told by one of their number about Colonel Ingersoll. A wealthy merchant died some time ago in a New Jersey town not a hundred miles from New York and left a legacy to the Sisters of Mercy of that town. It being discovered that there was no institution bearing this exact designation, payment of the legacy was disputed by the other heirs, who retained Ingersoll to contest the case. The opposing counsel in his argument laid great stress upon the evident wishes of the testator, whose idea, he claimed, was to benefit the various charitable institutions or, as he put it, "the Sisters of Charity of this town." When Ingersoll's turn came, he rose, coughed dryly, and said: "My learned brother claims that the testator intended to benefit the Sisters of Charity. My biblical ideas have only informed me of the existence of three sisters of this family, Faith, Hope, and Charity herself, and all three have long ago deserted New Jersey."

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

Mr. Lennstrand is kept pretty busy lecturing. During the week of July 8th-14th he was to lecture in ten different cities.

Representative Swedish Christians have not lost all shame yet. At least, a majority cast their vote against the appointment of a day for prayer against cholera.

The veteran German Freethinker and ex-priest, Johannes Czerski, celebrated on May 12th his eightieth anniversary. The old Freethinker has been bedridden for several years, but his mind is bright and active as ever.

The Catholic paper Columbia feels very much elated over Talmage's twenty-three per cent Christianity. Has the editor of Columbia forgotten Archbishop Purcell of Cincinnati and his financial transaction? The Catholics should remember that nice old saying about stones and glass houses.

Spanish Freethinkers are not behind the times. Las Dominicales announces that the Freethinker's Almanac for 1894 is nearly ready for the press. The sale of this almanac has been phenomenal during the last two years, and we heartily recommend it to our Spanish-American friends.

While Mr. Jehovah has no time or inclination to preserve his worshipers from death by starvation, fire, water, or wind, he is very particular in small matters. "Vengeance is mine," saith the Lord. Says a Catholic paper: "Julius H., a member of our holy church, was invited to dinner by a Protestant friend. It was a Friday, and there was meat on the table, and the Catholic ate thereof, and was choked to death in spite of the attendance of several physicians." Is the moral of this beautiful Sunday-school tale, "Don't eat meat on Friday," or "What fools these Catholics be?"

The criminal court at Buda-Pesth, Hungary, recently sentenced the Greek Catholic priest Johann Gormann to four and one-half years' imprisonment, his wife to two and one-half weeks', and his son to three weeks'. The priestly family by various crooked means had accumulated $60,000. They were found guilty of forgery, theft, and usury. An old tale about a wolf in sheep's clothing.

In each of the years 1727, 1741, 1756, 1826, 1846, and 1847 there was a famine in Ireland. In 1846-47 the United States sent shiploads of bread-stuff and thousands of dollars to the poor inhabitants of the snakeless island, yet during these two years Ireland contributed $6,000,000 to the household expenses of his infallible holiness at Rome. Moral: Do not cast bread on the waters; it will return to Rome.

Mr. Jehovah blesses his children in Russia by sending a famine typhus-fever. In a village of 500 families 188 have the famine-typhus, and 207 families are seeking for bread and other nourishment. In the province of Samara for the past year the number of deaths has been 40,900 over that of births. In the province of Saratov the population decreased 14,081. And this decline is not due to cholera only, but largely to chronic famine. Still we need not wonder. Russia has 40,000 priests only, not to mention monks, nuns, etc., and to keep these 40,000 beggars it pays each year 32,000,000 roubles. (A rouble is about 62 cents.)

The German-American Turnerbund, which consists mainly of outspoken Freethinkers, numbered at the close of last year 316 societies with 41,877 members, of which 34,044 are American citizens. The Turnerbund owns property worth $4,815,133, of which $4,173,721 is real estate. The income for the year ending April 1, 1893, was $19,739.46, the expenses during the same period $12,118.05. Why can there not be brought about a union of the Freethinking Turners and the Freethought Federation of America? Freethinkers should be above so small a thing as national pride. "The world is my country," said the immortal Paine. Let us live up to this precept of his.

The archbishop of Clermont, France, ordered the other day a great procession in which all the clergy of the district took part. Prayers by the ten thousands were sent up, incense was burnt, and all the church bells were ringing. They had a drouth at Clermont, a bad one; hence all this performance to make Mamma Mary ask her brother-in-law, Mr. Jehovah, to send some rain. Probably they had a family quarrel in heaven, and Mr. Jehovah was cranky, at least the rain did not come, and the many people who, acting upon the clergy's advice, had taken their umbrellas along, had a chance to use them as parasols. We advise the people of Clermont to send for a Yankee rainmaker. If they don't get just what they want, it will at any rate be cheaper.

In Topoliza, Hungary, they have a school for girls attached to the cloister of the Sisters of Mercy. The eight-year-old girl Marcia, daughter of Michael Szabo, was frequenting the school. This little girl got into a tangle with a schoolmate and during it committed the atrocious crime of saying, "The devil take you." The prioress, Armella Rii, said that the tongue that had spoken those words should be burnt. She heated an iron poker and burnt the child's face and hands in a most terrible manner, and would have thrust the red-hot poker in her mouth had the child not fought against it. The prioress has been arrested and the excitement in the village runs high. We call attention to this incident as showing what zealous believers in the "believe or be damned" religion are doing when they have the power. If the world at large is better now, it is not because the Christians have become tolerant; it is because they have lost the power.

We advise our friends to behave themselves and not engage in any pious hocuspocus wherewith to secure the pope's blessing. Papal blessing is a dark horse, as the following few historical blessings will prove:

1. The pope blessed Emperor Maximilian of Mexico before he left for that country. The emperor was shot.

2. The widow of the emperor, Empress Carlotta, was blessed when she returned to Europe. She died a lunatic.

3. Emperor Franz Josef was blessed previous to the battle at Sadowa, 1866. The Prussians beat him.

4. Isabella II. was blessed, and a short time after was dethroned.

5. Napoleon III. was blessed, and a few weeks later he capitulated at Sedan—Aug. 4, 1870.

6. The steamer Santa Maria with eleven sisters on board, and bound for Montevideo, was blessed. She sank in sight of the city.

7. Prince Louis, son of Napoleon III., was blessed before starting for Zululand. He was killed there.

8. Crown-prince Rudolph of Austria was blessed. A few days after he committed suicide.

9. Alphonso XII. was blessed. He died in the spring of life.

10. The bishops of Para and Pernambuco were blessed. A month later the court of Rio Janiero sentenced them to four years' imprisonment at hard labor.

11. The archbishop of Peru was blessed, and forty-three days later he died from poison.

12. The collegium of the Sisters of Mercy, New York city, was blessed. Three weeks later it was burnt down.

Man's Superiority to Other Animals.

Take an ass, it is an animal;
Religion is not known to him,
And still he never has burnt
A brother for heresy.
Therefore everybody can clearly see—
Even the youngest child—
The smartness of the human race
Against the foolishness of an ass.

Did it ever happen that wolves broke forth
In countless numbers out of valleys deep
To be slaughtered for the sake of others
On command in battles hot?
Do they sacrifice their own young lives
For another's glory? But Human beings to be sure are full of reason,
Wolves only are too stupid yet.

How to kill the adversary
Men are taking lessons,
Learning the best way of stabbing
One another with the dagger.
Our honor is saved so soon as
The blood is flowing from the enemy's veins.
Therefore compare the education of the human race
Against the stupid, foolish brutes.

Relics of Abraham Lincoln.

From the New York Times.

J. E. Remsburg, of Atchison, has some valuable relics of Abraham Lincoln, which came into his possession through the late W. H. Herndon, of Springfield, Ill. One of them is an old paper-bound book, entitled "The Kentucky Preceptor," from which Lincoln learned declamation when a boy. A more interesting relic is a ragged and yellow leaf from the copybook that Lincoln used. Among many sentences on this leaf is the following stanza of Lincoln's own production, probably his first attempt at writing poetry:

Abraham Lincoln, his hand and pen.
He will be good, but God knows when.

Another faded leaf shows young Lincoln's study of mathematics. Several problems in simple interest are worked out on this sheet. Mr. Remsburg has one of Lincoln's old documents in his own manuscript, held together by a pin inserted by Lincoln's own hand. Another manuscript presents some notes of an argument written by Lincoln in 1858. In the collection is a letter from Charles Sumner to W. H. Herndon, congratulating Illinois on the election of Lyman Trumbull to the United States Senate in 1856. The letter is inclosed in the original envelope.

These relics are well authenticated, and are prized by the present owner, especially those relating to the boyhood of the great president.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.
2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.
3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.
4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.
5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.
6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.
7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

MR. FRANKLIN STEINER has been engaged to deliver an address at the International Freethought Congress. During September he will fill some appointments in Iowa, and later in the fall will start East on a lecture trip, in which direction he already has some appointments. Address him at Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

Letters of Friends.

Till Victory Is Ours.

BRAGGVILLE, MASS., July 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: You will please find inclosed $4.10—$3 for the dear old TRUTH SEEKER and $1.10 for the following books: "Miracles and Miracle-Workers," Peck; "Crimes of Preachers," "Besant-Hatchard Debate," "False Claims of Church," Bell's "Outline of French Revolution," "John's Way," and "Crimes Against Criminals." Yours till victory is ours or life ended,

T. N. SHERMAN.

They Steal Not Only Our Taxes But Our Books.

LOS BANNOS, CAL., June 26, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $3 for another year's subscription. I wish to make a request to Brother Heston to give us a cartoon on the Christians' bad habits of destroying Infidel literature—say for instance, a good old Infidel with sifter in hand in the back-yard of a Christian Endeavor family sifting the ash-heap for TRUTH SEEKERS, Paine's "Age of Reason," etc. This idea is suggested from the loss of books and papers. WM. H. DEVOR.

A Bustling Missionary.

YOUNGSTOWN, O., June 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find money for another copy of "Bible Stories Comically Illustrated." I have been having lots of amusement and doing some good with it, "Men, Women, and Gods," and the other books I got, and am keeping them going from reader to reader. Liberal sentiment is spreading rapidly here, and I think when I get back from the mountains this fall I will be able to get a TRUTH SEEKER club up. I intend to be with the brethren in Chicago October next.

THOMAS BURTON.

GRINNELL, IA., July 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: My paper failed to reach me last week, and I have not slept well since. Please send me one issue, the 7th of July. After reading I start them on a pilgrimage, and keep them going as long as there is a page left and I can get people to read them. We have two news-stands or dealers that promised to keep it on sale. Please send terms to dealers to them. There could be several copies sold here if it was generally known that they could be had of the news-dealers.

Yours for death to priestcraft and superstition,

W. A. THRALL.

The Creation of Man and God.

GREYCOURT, N. Y., June 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please duplicate me a copy of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER issue of June 17th? From some cause I did not receive it. By the way, I have enjoyed an intellectual feast perusing the ten or a dozen Freethought volumes secured at your office when last in the city. The "Dynamic Theory" is indeed a digest of science; and a single chapter thereof effectually refutes the argument that a God created man in his own image. It seems altogether more probable that ignorant man evolved God in his own image—in the image of man evolved he him.

PAUL S. TOOKER.

The Religion of Renunciation.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I was very much disgusted to-day on hearing the confession of a young maiden, about twenty years old, who came into our jewelry store to purchase a cheap silver case for her watch, the cases of which were fourteen-karat twenty-year filled gold, at a cost of $25. She offered to exchange even up to get the silver case for her movement. She was very reluctant to have to give up her "gold watch," but the German Baptist church of which she was a member gave her orders she must do this to retain her membership, as gold was a curse which would probably keep her from going to heaven.

CHAS. P. SCHELLBERG.

STAPLES, MINN., June 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: There appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER, under date of April 4, 1893, a letter requesting exchange of information. It was written by Mrs. Rose R. Delders, Ann Arbor, Mich. I wrote to her address, but received no reply. This was about one year ago. I have sent her a registered letter, and have received a card from the postmaster that she is unknown there and he is unable to deliver it. If she is a subscriber to your paper, perhaps you can tell me if she has changed her address. Perhaps some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER have had better success with her in getting the advertised information than I have, and can tell something about it.

D. C. JENKINS.

Says Women Are Intellectually Inferior and Like to Show Off.

NUNACH, CAL., April 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I see by your issue of March 25th, that two ladies, both hailing from the Garden of the West, Kansas, have something to say about my views on the woman suffrage question. One congratulates me on my position, and, of course, I feel highly gratified that a lady of such common sense as her article proves her to be should praise my humble efforts. The other lady proceeds, figuratively speaking, to give it to me right straight from the shoulder, and I suppose it is expressions like this that have shocked Miss Laura Knox (I do not know, my dear madam, whether you are a Mrs. or miss, but I will take the liberty to presume the latter, as none but old maids could possibly object to one or two strong expressions, where these express the meaning much more forcibly than chaste Bostonese English would). You should go and hear Mr. Sam Jones once, Miss Laura Knox.

The lady from Kansas also thinks I expressed my views from a hasty impulse, together with an effort to show off. I will say that I certainly tried to show as many points as I could on my side of the question; and, as far as the hasty impulse goes, that is rather a feminine characteristic, I think. I consider the woman suffrage question of paramount importance, and as I said in my article, I think that a great many Liberals do not see it in its true light. I do not propose, Mr. Editor, to take up a lot of your valuable space to answer Miss Laura Knox, as there is really nothing to answer. She has confined her article mainly to the typical woman's answer when argument fails, viz., showing up the lordly man drawing himself up in his dignity, etc., etc. Now, I did not once touch on that delicate question, man's intellectual superiority over woman. Had I, there would have been something, at least, to haul me over the coals for. It is extraordinary how names are misapplied in this age. Mr. Westbrook still persists in calling himself a Liberal, regardless of Mr. Putnam's unanswerable argument that he is not. Likewise Miss Laura Knox calls herself a Liberal, and thinks I am not because I won't actually prohibit a set of fanatics from commanding me what to do and not to do on Sunday. Verily, there are strange people in Kansas.

ALBERT SANDBERG.

Rather a Vituperative Lunatic.

CHICAGO, April 18, 1893.

ADDRESSED TO THE FREETHOUGHT PUB. CO.: To the Principals and Originators of That Concern: A friend of mine loaned me a book which has for its title the name "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." Whether it was done casually or from a sinister motive, I do not know. This is what I think of the disgraceful book and its perpetrators—perpetrators is the word. It is clumsy, rakish, and swinish wit. (Wit is the word, for I know no word to take its place.) It savors of fat men and swine, likewise hypocrisy and spite. It savors of the hoodlum and the barroom tough. It savors of all things that are foul and rotten. It savors of all things the reverse of charity, chastity, and humanity. It savors of a generation of vipers. It is a disgrace to the laws of a nation. In no other country would such a book be tolerated.

This is what the writer thinks of the authors of this work. It will likewise be the truth, for as much as I may be tempted to resort to sarcasm, ridicule, and exaggeration, or, in other words, lies, it is forbidden me—a Christian.

An honest skeptic and a scoffer are as diverse in character as two persons can be. An honest skeptic is free from malice and contention, free from hypocrisy and destructiveness. An honest skeptic, a peaceful one, a neutral one, can be everything that is noble, humane, and true, but a scoffer, a man that ridicules religion of any kind, heathen or Christian, is vile and low-bred in thought, is ignoble, rakish, garrulous, and swinish in nature. An active, scoffing skeptic is an Anarchist. They, like Anarchists, seldom ever become men of note. There are exceptions. Colonel R. G. Ingersoll is one of them. Even he, aggressive as he is against the scriptures and Christianity, would not be guilty of even sanctioning anything so corrupt as the book referred to. He, it would seem, was merely a fat, good-natured, garrulous sort of a skeptic, who was really at one time sincere, in the main part, in his tirade against religion. He, it appears, was seeking gold and notoriety. You are not like him. You are hypocrites. When you saw the finger of God as was revealed to the world according to the prophet which he sent, a few years since, instead of repenting and acknowledging your sins, and acknowledging that you were wrong, you continued in sinfulness and hypocrisy from sheer meanness and hardness of heart. I would not have written this to you, ignoring all sin, as it would have been weakness and futile to do otherwise, until the time of the beginning of judgment was close at hand. But as the time is very short, but a few hours, according to the Lord's reckoning, I thought it meet to write and admonish you to repent.

Prophet of the Lord.

We Must Have Liberal Sunday-schools.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Feb. 1, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have been looking round for some time for some way to help the cause of Liberalism, but have not made a success of my undertaking. I have been taking THE TRUTH SEEKER for more than two years. There is a splendid picture on the first page, Jan. 28, 1893. It is of free schools. I can loan the papers and the Bible Picture Book, "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," also the Boston Investigator and Secular Thought, all of which are good family papers. I have some books, all of which I can loan out without any trouble, and some of them are read. But I could never get anyone to subscribe for papers or buy books.

Now, I have a letter before me from W. F. Jamieson, with the plan of pamphletting the churches, and I see this idea indorsed by quite a number of Liberals. I have nothing against the plan that Mr. Jamieson has in view. But I wish to say through the columns of your paper that not many of those that have grown up to men and women in the churches ever become Liberals. There are many reasons for them not doing so. I will only mention two of them. The church-member is not accustomed to thinking. He pays the preacher for doing his thinking. Then for a church-member to become a Freethinker or a Liberal it takes a good deal of study and reading—more reading and study than they want to give. Now, to my mind the thing Liberals want to do is to start Liberal Sunday-schools and train up the young. That is the way the churches recruit their ranks. Liberals, start with the children, and bring them up Liberals. The church robs the cradle, and commences to plant the seeds of superstition to recruit its army and keep it up. Now, to start a Sunday-school and to make it interesting to the children there would have to be books suitable for children, and cards. But my idea was only to suggest the matter of the Sunday-school, as all Liberals must see by this time how slow the cause is spreading. But I would like to hear from some of the more able writers on the subject. They have more experience than I have, but that is my idea of making Liberals. Then we would have Liberals dyed in the wool.

DELMONT JONES.

P.S.—We certainly need some good Liberals to be growing up to defend our free institutions, I feel after reading Mr. Putnam's piece on the World's Fair on Sunday in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 28, 1893.

True Nature of the Clergy.

PENIEL, O., June 28, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I live in a community where the priests reign supreme. To be a clergyman in this section of the country is to be in heaven as near as there is a heaven, not at rest in Abraham's bosom exactly, but often resting in the arms of some lady follower. They dine at the best tables, sleep in the best beds, and scoop in their aim (the dollar), while their superstitious slaves honor and worship them.

The Christians denounce me for reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, and in return I denounce their Bible, which is rotten to the core, for by its teachings the many are enslaved, and the most damnable, rotten class in human form on the face of the globe (the clergy) are supported in luxury through its teachings, by a class of fools, but honest, laboring people. I hope the time is near when all such medicine men as the above-named will be compelled to go to honest labor for their support. I became a Freethinker not by reading Freethought literature, but by going to church (especially revivals) and reading the Bible. It has only been recently that I knew where to get any Freethought literature; since I have found out, I have used all the money, and even more than I am able to spare, in that direction, and intend to continue doing so. Among my library of Freethought I have "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated" and the "Freethinkers' Pictorial Text-Book." I would not be without those two books for ten times what they cost me. And THE TRUTH SEEKER, with Heston's finishing touch, beats the world for a Freethought paper.

I notice an article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 20th from S. F. Davis, of Portland, Kan., explaining to George Geer how a wage-earner can save from $1 to $10 a week without taking any money out of circulation. This reverend gentleman's article of the grasshopper state contains the germ of a monopolizer's argument. Of course we have no reason to believe this gentleman monopolizes anyone, or that he is even in more than living circumstances, but from the principles he upholds, the masses of the people to-day are pauperized and enslaved.

Peradventure Mr. Davis means to save $10 a week by extorting twenty per cent interest from his neighbor, to keep his property from being sold for taxation when he encounters some natural calamity as cyclones and grasshoppers.

Mr. Davis's article contains the essence of selfishness and miserly oppression. He can learn from Mr. Geer's article of May 28th that saving and hoarding money is not what a man wants if he even can do so; he wants to make money and use it; then he can live and let live, and reap the reward of his labor. The miser's idea of happiness is to grasp every copper he can, and if he is hoggish enough, he makes it double itself, then compounds it. But his money is as his life, a failure, and both he and his money are oppressive to the poor, and better had it been for himself and his fellow-beings had he died at his birth.

Mr. Davis's explanation of this money-saving question is suited for a miser, and by such misers extending into monopolists has financially ruined this country.

ALBERT SHELTON.

A True Ghost Story.

June 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: When I was a lad, one evening while my grandfather was sitting in the house I stood at the garden gate watching the last ray of departing day. Everything was calm and peaceful. Brother John on a sudden rushed up to the door with a face pale as death. I caught him by the arm and asked what was the matter. "I have seen my sister—I have seen my sister."

My grandfather was a very grave man, and somewhat sharp-tempered, though kindly at heart. But he was a little skeptical upon points far removed from superstition, and looking up said, "What does John mean? His sister has not arrived home from her visit?"

"If it was not she, it was her spirit," replied John. "I saw her as plainly as I see you now. Her night-dress brushed against me."

"So she was in her night-dress, was-she?" said my grandfather. "Boy, you have been exciting your imagination with ghost stories."

"No, I have not," answered John. "I was thinking of nothing when she came suddenly by me."

My grandfather mused a little.

"Did she speak?" he said.

"Not a word," said John. "How could she speak? I am sure she is dead."

"If she is dead, she could speak as well as move," said grandfather. "But don't be foolish, John. Your sister is a fine healthy girl. No fear of her being dead."

"I am sure she is dead."

"Pooh, pooh," said grandfather. "Take John into the other room. Something has put him out of spirits."

My grandfather made light of the whole business, and read me a long lecture upon superstition that very evening. He wrote to relieve John's mind, and received an answer of the poor girl's death on the very evening when John fancied he had seen her. It was a singular coincidence. I thought grandfather winced a little, but only in a dry, skeptical manner. I pondered long upon the subject, and have drawn my own conclusions. As regarding the soul's destiny, a future state, a world beyond the sight, it is worth to me all the arguments in the world, when I can understand it.

I did not reason much on the event that had occurred, it is true. I was too young. But I never became convinced that disembodied spirits walk the earth and fill the air beside us. In the darkest night, in the most lonely place, I never feared to see a spirit, or, to use a good old Anglo-Saxon word, ghost. On the contrary, I rather longed for it, and would give much to have held some communication with several of those who have left me upon earth, my mother and friend especially. I remember, too, that, my mind, led by events which had occurred, brooded over it. I speculated curiously as to how long sensation, consciousness, lingered in the corporeal frame after actual life had departed. I asked myself, Can the dead feel? Can they hear? Do they know? Are they conscious of what is passing around them? My grandfather, as I have said, was somewhat of a skeptical turn of mind. His reason was of a very speculative character. He was fond of every sort of discussion, and particularly in collection of facts which would form the basis of arguments.

No reverence ever stopped him. No awe of any being or any theme stood in his way. He used to say, everything may be true, everything may; and everything may be false; let us always inquire which it is, and keep our minds open to conviction. He was a Freethinker, and if he was alive now would be delighted to read the various opinions published in THE TRUTH SEEKER. O religion! O conscience! what crimes have been committed in thy name! Thy laws have often been more cruel than those of Nero. Claiming the authority of God, thou hast so pictured or caricatured him as to make him offensive to all benevolent minds. Calling thyself deity, thou hast perverted all morality. Is there a crime which thou hast not at times sanctioned? Thou sanctioned deceit among the Jesuits. When men have done evil, thou hast lent thy sanction, confirmed them in their wickedness, and aggravated their crimes. The Inquisition with its instruments of torture is thy symbol. In obedience to thy command, good men have been burnt at the stake, or shut up in the darkness of the dungeon till they became maddened. What is vastly worse, thou hast in willfulness deprived whole communities of innocent enjoyments, and led multitudes to bow before the most abject of superstitions and to expose themselves to the most terrible lacerations. S. R. THORNE.

Fighting the Church.

VERA CRUZ, Mo., June 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Through the kindness of a friend I have been receiving a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER lately, and as I pass them around among the ostracised ones of our locality I find they are creating an appetite for more, consequently I am going to try to get up a club for you. We have a few brave men and women here who have courage enough to raise their heads above the waves of darkness and be counted for truth, regardless of the anathemas and condemnations of the intolerant church bigots that swarm around us and try to crush us down. We have been holding a few godless meetings this fall in our district and the one adjoining us on the east and I tell you from the amount of stir we created to follow us I begin to think we must be of considerable importance. A friend and I talked a few weeks ago to a handsome audience at Denny & Decker's Mills, about four miles from here. Among the audience we found were some sky-pilots, who had been brought in cocked and primed and fully prepared to swoop upon us and down us. After we had made our principal talk we granted the opportunity desired and one of the followers of the meek and lowly myth took the floor. He scouted, he spouted, he puffed and foamed and shouted, and finally, when in our closing remarks he found we failed to down, he and some of the rest of his fellows, who always keep an abundant supply of that good Christian spirit, like their pet, Jesus (Luke xix, 27), seemed to want those who would not they should reign over them brought hither and slain before them. Some of the followers of that meek and lowly three-times-one-make-one talked as though they were afraid "Old Billy" might strike me down for some of my blasphemous talk, but I told them if they would just keep their own hands off and let the old fellow do his own striking, I would probably live for many days yet to preach for truth and drive away the darkness that causes human butchers to condemn and murder men for opinion's sake.

I think I have made an important discovery since I landed at this place about two years ago. I have probably found the missing link in Darwin's chain. I find, not a thousand miles from here, a species of slimy, half-made quadrupeds that in some respects resemble the human form, yet in disposition I think the darkness of about a thousand years ago would closely fit them. A part of the breed are nearly all mouth and it is always filled with a kind of feigning, hypocritical smear that they use to rope their victims in with. Like a great many other kinds of animals, they have one that seems to be a leader or big dog with a brass collar on among them. He is very hide-bound and selfish, and appears to hold complete control over the rest of his tribe. When he growls they all have to bark, and when he says "puppy," puppy it must be without a murmur. There is one word that these fellows use to scare their subjects together with and it always seems to fetch them. That is the awful word "Infidel." They have a great regard for truth when they are the ones that tell it, and they are very peaceable as long as they can have things exactly their own way. They very much esteem justice as long as it is the other fellow who is dealing it out, and they have a particular love for the precept to do unto others as you would have others do unto you as long as others are the ones that are doing it. Adversity does not appear to trouble them when they can cover it up with that smear from their mouths. And from their actions I judge they hold that an honest man has no rights that a hypocrite is bound to respect. Rule or ruin seems to be their motto, and their eyes are so placed that they can only look inwardly for justice. They are nearly always in trouble and striving with their neighbors, and after they have done some mean thing to anyone the next thing is to lick him over or smear others in on top of him so as to crush him down and make their infamy popular by a majority vote. These fellows make long and loud prayers to be heard of men and in a revival-meeting great tears roll down their cheeks like boulders from a mountain top; their voices in shouting their praises to that great bugaboo are "like that of many waters," the Western coyote that is gaunt with rage, or the panther with its mimic yell that seeks by deception to capture its prey and grow fat on the body of its victim. They prate a great deal about what they call heartfelt religion—something that I suppose is unknown except in a locality like this; yet it appears to create a frame of mind in the victim that is caught by the craze, that makes him positive of everything his emotional nature gasps at. He knows to a positive certainty that he has the love of "Gawd" in his heart, and he knows that a man with a calm, reflective nature, who looks intelligently and candidly into matters before he acts and doesn't go crazy and act the fool just as he does, is doomed to endless punishment in a place he is pleased to call hell, although he knows no more about the place than he does about charity, decency, or the rights of man toward man, except as he finds it of his own manufacture. I am satisfied now in my mind that if these creatures all "hold out faithful to the end," there will some of them at least get to that heaven they are figuring so conspicuously for—that is, the insane asylum; and I think if they get their just deserts they will be tapped for the simplest the first thing after their arrival.

S. B. DAVIS.

If We Have No Right to Close Church Doors, Pietists Have No Right to Close Fair Doors.

BELVIDERE, ILL., March 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Since it is recorded in the Constitution of our country that Congress shall have no authority to enact any religious laws, it becomes the duty of every loyal American citizen to defy and to violate every law that a disloyal majority of Congressmen shall enact that is a clear violation of the country's Constitution. When any Congress shall become so corrupt and obsequious that in order to please the enemies of religious liberty and the Constitution, it shall in obedience to their mandates enact laws that are contrary to it, then the time has arrived for those who have a loyal regard for that sacred document to call a halt and declare that though a time-serving majority of Congressmen shall command them to dishonor the Constitution they shall not do so, for knowing that it is the bulwark of civil and religious liberty, they know that allegiance to it is the first requisite of every patriotic citizen.

Now Congress has enacted that the Fair must be closed on Sunday. If we ask why, they will probably tell us because it is a legal holiday. To sensible minds this is a very silly excuse, for the Fair should be opened all the more for that very reason. The Fourth of July is the greatest of all legal holidays, but no one dreams that on that account the Fair will be closed that day. No, indeed, the very opposite instead, for fair days and holidays harmonize exactly with each other. If driven to give the actual reason, they are compelled to acknowledge that it is because Sunday is held by some people to be a holy day, and to please those people, and in the interests of holiness, they enact a holy law—that is to say, a religious law, which is a direct violation of the Constitution. Now, we defy anyone to make anything more or less out of it: therefore, the people of Chicago, the Fair managers, and every citizen of the United States should from principle despise, disobey, and defy this unconstitutional enactment. It is not a law; for a law, in order to be a law, should necessarily accord with the Constitution. Does any patriotic citizen think of interfering in any manner whatever with one who wishes to observe Sunday in the orthodox style, and try to prevent him from attending his chosen place of worship? Certainly not; every man of them knows that it would be treason to the Constitution to do so. Then, certainly it is equally treasonable for anyone to close the doors of the temples of science against those who prefer to exercise their constitutional rights to worship at the shrine of science and art. Is it a crime to look upon the works of nature, science, and art on Sunday? If it is, then it is reasonable to claim that it is a crime to do so any day of the week, and accordingly the Fair should be closed on week-days. But Sunday closers claim that it leads to vice to look at these things on Sunday, whereas to look at the same things on Monday is a virtuous act. They claim that to look at them on Sunday is a crime against God. Very well, they have a perfect right to think the most unreasonable things in the world. They have also as great a right to say so. But that is all. They have no right under heaven to force others to conform to what they think or say. In like manner the Sunday openers have no right to oblige anyone to conform to their opinions. In short, since the Sunday openers have no constitutional right to close the doors of any church against anyone, then in like manner the Sunday closers have not one iota of a right to close the doors of the temples of science against anyone who wishes to attend. And not all the Congressmen in the universe, backed by fifty thousand preachers with petitions as long as their intolerant consciences will allow them to stretch them, can debar a liberty-loving people from spending Sunday in their own way and attending the Fair if they wish to on Sunday. That is, as long as our beloved country's Constitution is in force. When it is not, and is trampled underfoot by its enemies, when Hierocracy instead of Democracy holds the reins of government, when instead of temples of science an inquisition is built on Jackson park, when the good old days of religious persecution have come again (and it begins to look a little that way now), when we are enjoying all the evils attending a union of church and state, when we are once more enjoying the civilization of the fifteenth century in the way that the unfortunate people of Italy and Spain used to enjoy it, then of course we will have no right to demand any Sunday enjoyments, and we will have to draw our faces a yard long, and our Sunday songs will have to conform to the "Hark from the tombs" style. Now, in view of the fact, the lamentable fact, that a concentrated and organized band of enemies to the rights of conscience for which our forefathers fought and bled have managed to coerce both our Congressmen and Fair managers to sell the birthright of freemen for a detestable $2,500,000 mess of pottage; therefore, it becomes all lovers of freedom to use every possible means to defeat this treasonable attempt on our liberties.

Now, the citizens of Chicago should by legal compulsion oblige the gates to be open on Sunday, for the reason that it is held in a park that belongs to the people and which was originally deeded to the people for the main purpose of Sunday recreation. It was originally designed, set apart, and chartered for the purpose of giving the thousands who are restricted by labor and business a chance at least once a week to partake of nature's joys. The people have permitted the World's Fair to be established there for the purpose of increasing those joys, not to retard them. They have never given any Religio-Rum combination the ghost of a right to usurp possession of the grounds on Sunday to the exclusion of the owners of the grounds. They have never sold this right to anyone. And no Congressional power or any power in the world has any power to infringe on this right. And fifty million of dollars should not buy it. The Sunday enjoyment of the park remains intact with the people. If the Fair managers say they can not furnish the enjoyment on account of being crippled by a Congressional enactment, then the city authorities should order them to move all of their truck off the grounds every Saturday night so that the people can have their rightful enjoyment of the grounds every Sunday. If the Fair managers think that it will pay them better to do this than to take in about half a million dollars every Sunday, it is for them to judge best. If they think it best to open the gates under such circumstances, then in order to avoid infringing on anyone's conscientious scruples, no attempt should be made to compel anyone to attend the Fair on Sunday, and if any exhibitor has anything on exhibition that he considers a sin to be looked at on Sunday, let him have the privilege of removing it or covering it from view. In this way no one's rights will be encroached upon, and no one with a spark of brains in his head will be able to say that any injustice has been done to him. There may be a few other ways of dealing with the last-century mossbacks, but perhaps this way will be sufficient.

Hopefully, I remain a Friend to Equal Rights,

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Friendship.

When shadows flit across my path,
And leaden are the clouds;
When storms arise in furious wrath,
And all the daylight shroud;
When spite and envy linger near,
With malice-burdened dart,
Intent to strike me now and here—
To pierce my very heart;
When those I trusted stand aside,
Or lightly float away,
As birds of passage oft espied,
That tarry but a day,
Then, as the stars in darkest night
Show with a clearer ray,
Whose mildly sweet and steady light
Shines on to perfect day;
So stand the faithful friends and true,
Firm as the century's rock;
Unmoved by falsehood, old or new,
Steadfast beyond all shock.
Their names are fragrant as the rose,
With petals snowy white;
Within my heart their value grows
As priceless as the light.

How Billy Took His Lager.

"Boy Billy" was the adopted son of Christian Zende, an honest German, who was much shocked one day at seeing the boy in a lager beer resort, tossing off a glass of foaming beer. He bade the boy go home, but said nothing till evening. After tea, Zende seated himself at the table and placed before him a variety of queer things. Billy looked on with curiosity.

"Come here, Billy," said Christian Zende. "Why were you in the beer-shop to-day? Why do you drink beer, my boy?"

"Oh—oh—because it's good," said Billy, boldly.

"No, Billy, it is not good to the month. I did never see so big faces as you did make. Billy, you think it will taste good by and by, and it looks like a man to drink; and so you drink. Now, Billy, if it is good, have it. I will not hinder you from what is good and manly; but drink it at home; take your drink pure, Billy, and let me pay for it. Come, my boy! You like beer? Well, open your mouth. I have all the beer stuff, pure from the shop. Come, open your mouth, and I will put it in."

Billy drew near, but kept his mouth close shut.

Said Zende: "Don't you make me mad, Billy. Open your mouth."

Thus exhorted, Billy opened his mouth, and Zende put a small bit of alum in it. Billy drew up his face. A bit of aloes followed. This was worse. Billy winced. The least morsel of red pepper now, from a knife point, made Billy howl.

"What, not like beer!" said Zende. "Open your mouth." A knife dipped in oil of turpentine made Billy cry.

"Open your mouth; the beer is not half made yet."

And Billy's tongue got the least dusting of lime, potash, and saleratus. Billy now cried loudly. Then came a grain each of licorice, hop pollen, and salt-peter.

"Look, Billy! Here is some arsenic and some strychnine which is used to kill rats!"

"I shall die! Oh—oh—oh—do you want to kill me, Father Zende?"

"Kill him! just by a little beer, all good and pure! He tells me he likes beer, and it is manly to drink it, and when I give him some, he cries I kill him! Here is water. There is much water in beer."

Billy drank the water eagerly. Zende went on.

"There is much alcohol in beer. Here, open your mouth," and he dropped four drops of raw spirits carefully on his tongue. Billy went dancing about the room, and then ran for more water.

"Come here, the beer is not done, Billy," and seizing him, he put the cork of an ammonia bottle to his lips, then a drop of honey, a taste of sugar, a drop of molasses, and a drop of gall. "There, Billy! here is jalap, copperas, sulphuric acid, and nux vomica. Open your mouth."

"Oh, no, no!" said Billy. "Let me go. I hate beer. I'll never drink any more! I'll never go in that shop again. Oh, let me go! I can't eat those things. My mouth tastes awful now. Oh, take them away, Father Zende!"

"Take them away? Take away good beer, when I have paid for it? My boy, you drank them fast to-day."

"Oh, they make me sick," said Billy. "A man drinks all these bad things mixed up in water. He gets red in the face; he gets big in his body; he gets shaky in his hands; he gets weak in his eyes; he gets mean in his manner."

Billy was satisfied on the beer question.

The Student's Prayer.

There was long ago a divinity hall presided over by a most amiable and dignified professor. On certain days the senior students opened the proceedings of the day with prayer. One morning a raw youth from a remote region performed this duty, and it was a memorable occasion. None who were present can forget how the venerable professor turned and gazed on the untutored lad who prayed for him as follows: "Lord, have mercy on our professor, for he is weak and ignorant. Strengthen his feeble hands, confirm his tottering knees, and grant that he may go out and in before us like the he-goat before his flock."—Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews.

When Edith Was Wicked.

Little Edith, a five-year-old daughter whose behavior is not always the best the market affords, has been full of excitement over the cold weather and skating prospect. She went to her mother a day or two ago begging for a pair of skates, to which request the reply was given that the skates should be got if she would "try to be a good girl, not just for to-day: Edith," said her mother, who thought she saw an opportunity, "but for every day."

Edith's black eyes snapped. "You can keep your old skates," she replied promptly and disrespectfully, "if I've got to be an angel all the time!"—New York Times.

"MAMMA," said little Willie, "I cannot tell a lie, I took that pie to feed a poor, little starving boy."

"My darling child," said his mother, "and did the poor little fellow eat it?"

"No'm. You see, I couldn't find any starving boy to give it to, so I had to eat it myself."

Correspondence.

DORA, Mo., July 1, 1893.

MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt to write to the Corner. My father has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about twenty years. I like to read the Children's Corner so much.

The Fourth of July will be celebrated at one of the many springs near this place. I spent last Sunday at a spring called Double Springs. It is just one spring, but there is a large rock that separates the water into two parts; one stream flows north and the other south.

Either stream is large enough to row a boat on, and they flow into North Fork of White river about a mile apart.

CLARA F. FISCHER.

FRESNO FLATS, CAL., June 28, 1893.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE CORNER: As I have not seen anything from this part of the country, I will tell you where I am. It is about seven thousand feet above sea level in the Sierra Nevada mountains, among the pine and redwood timber. I was to where they were cutting the big tree for the World's Fair, and was on the stump. If any of the readers of the Corner would like the full description of the tree, I will send it if they will write to me.

This is a delightful climate here through the summer, but the winter is as bad as in the Eastern states.

I am the only one that takes THE TRUTH SEEKER up here, but there are several that say it is the boss paper. As for my part, it can't be beat.

I will close for this time. If it don't find the waste-basket, I will write again.

M. D. PRICE.

AUSTIN, NEV., May 25, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As every week I glance over the letters of the Children's Corner, I feel ashamed of myself for not helping in our contest for liberty of thought and speech. As I read every week of the closing of the Fair on Sunday, it makes me laugh to think that a man who has been a ringleader to have the gates of the Fair closed on Sunday, turned around and had the pure and unadulterated gall to think that he could get in and view it when thousands of poor workingmen had to take a back seat. What next? Let us look back in history at the once powerful republic of Rome. While the pagans were in the majority it continued to be a republic, but the Christian religion sapped the foundation of Rome, and hence she fell. So will it be with America if the clergy once get their heads above water. I hope the time will come when mankind will rise out of the pool of superstition, and not be afraid of any superhuman god. This will not be done till religion is taken out of the public schools and the churches are destroyed. One day I was talking with some friends, and one of them asked me to which church I belonged. I told them there would be a green moon when they saw me praying to any god on the face of the earth or in "heaven" either. I told them also that if the Lord had a mind to strike me dead he could for all I cared. They told me to look out, that he would be mean enough to murder one he had "made." Well, I am not dead yet, nor do I expect to die by his hand. I have made one convert of a boy of my size, fourteen years, who, not more than a year ago, was baptized in the "Holy Catholic church." He blasphemes his God, much to the dismay of the mother and sister. He saw that I lived as well as he did, so he rose out of the mud.

Yours truly, HARRY MOSS.

COLUMBUS, KAN., July 11, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I want to write you a long and appreciative letter, but cannot now. I still suffer, and enjoy, and struggle to live here alone with all my ailments and misfortunes. I think of and bless you often as though you were my own daughter. I send a few words for Miss Palm, whose death was a great shock to me. I also send my opinions of the two books you commended. Will you please send them to THE TRUTH SEEKER? Perhaps I should not have troubled you. If so, forgive me.

Bless you in every sense.

J. H. COOK.

WORDS FOR ANNETTA C. PALM.

I ask space to express my appreciation of departed worth. And can it, must it be that my generous friend and correspondent is dead? "How blessings brighten as they take their flight." I never saw Annetta in person, but I held sweet communion with her mind and spirit by my pen and the mental telegraph. Over three years ago she read that I was a poor old invalid, in need, and made me very happy by sending me a donation with kind and appreciative words. They came from the head and heart of a noble, free, sympathetic, truth-loving, humane, exalted girl, responsive to the higher spiritual, mental life. She sent me two more small donations, or which I was very grateful. But the spirit that prompted her to write such encouraging words to me—how it endeared her to me! Tearful emotions, inexpressible in words, fill me. It was too much for my sensitive nature. Dear Annetta, you will ever live in some form. Your life and noble deeds shall emit undying fragrance, grateful to the living, salutary to future generations. In tears and irrepressible emotions I will say, Farewell.

[It is hard to be aged, feeble, and suffering. Pathetic cases of trial and pain are on every hand, and some are utterly unworthy who seek aid and sympathy. All may be assured, however, that our aged friend and toiler for the truth, Professor Cook, is most worthy, and any gift, however small, sent direct to his address will be most gratefully received. He has done good service for Freethought in his day, and still is not idle in his old age and feebleness.—ED. C. C.]

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. JOHN E. REMSBURG'S WORKS.

Abraham Lincoln: Was He A Christian?

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

False Claims. Revised and Enlarged.

As a Missionary Document it is unexcelled. Among the subjects considered by Mr. Remsburg are: The Church and Morality; Criminal Statistics, showing the creeds of the prisoners in the penitentiaries; the Church and Civilization; the Church and Science; the Church and Learning; the Church and Liberty; the Church and the Antislavery Reform; the Woman's Rights Movement; the Temperance Reform; the Church and the Republic. Price, 10 cents singly; 75 cents per dozen.

Bible Morals. Twenty Crimes and Vices Sanctioned by Scripture: Falsehood and Deception; Cheating; Theft and Robbery; Adultery and Prostitution; Murder; Wars of Conquest and Extermination; Despotism; Intolerance and Persecution; Injustice to Woman; Unkindness to Children; Cruelty to Animals; Human Sacrifices; Cannibalism; Slavery; Witchcraft; Polygamy; Intemperance; Poverty and Vagrancy; Ignorance and Idiotcy; Obscenity. Price, single copies, 25 cents; 6 copies, $1. Special discount on larger quantities.

Sabbath-Breaking. This is the best and most thorough work ever written on the Sabbath from a rational point of view. Large and handsome print. The question is discussed under the following heads: Origin of the Sabbath Idea; the Jewish Sabbath; the Christian Scriptures and the Sabbath; Examination of Sunday Arguments; Origin of the Christian Sabbath; Testimony of the Christian Fathers; the Sabbath during the Middle Ages; the Puritan Sabbath; Testimony of Christian Reformers, Scholars, and Divines; Abrogation of Sunday Laws. Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.
We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE. A Historical Account of the Status of Woman Through the Christian Ages. With Reminiscences of the Matriarchate. By Matilda Joselyn Gage. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Pp. 545, price in cloth $2, in half leather $3.

This is a work of a nature which has long been desired. Freethinkers attempting to combat the churchly assertion that the condition of woman has been higher under Christianity than under previous religions, and that that religion is the cause of this elevation, have not before had so complete a storehouse of facts and arguments for their side. The work will be of equal interest, too, to every thinking woman, supplying the history of her sex and giving the facts from which she can deduce how the present character and circumstances of femininity came to be. And the book deals not only with the church and woman, but, as its title reads, with woman, church, and state. So the woman suffragist who endeavors to remove the present discriminations against woman by the state, will find here a necessary relation of the course of those discriminations in the past.

The work is quite encyclopedic. We cannot well convey an idea of the vast number of the facts packed in its pages. We will, however, skip through the volume with our readers viewing at least some of the information contained.

Chapter I deals with The Matriarchate. The matriarchate or mother-rule was a form of society that existed at an early age, and continued till very recently. It was the government of the mother. Under the matriarchate, except as son and inferior, man was not recognized in any one of these great institutions—family, church, and state. A father and husband as such had no place in the social, political, or religious scheme. Woman ruled in each. The child bore its mother's name, tracing its descent from her. Her authority over it was regarded as in accord with nature. The father, having no part in the family, was a wanderer. The Iroquois or Six Nations of Indians lived under the matriarchate. Its existence and workings in the ancient Aryans, Egypt, Malabar, and other places are described. There was great authority of the wife in the most polished nations of antiquity. As vestal virgin in Rome, woman's authority was great both in civil and in religious affairs. Monogamy was the rule of the matriarchate. Polygamy, infanticide, and prostitution became the rule with the institution of patriarchy or father-rule.

Chapter II is on Celibacy. The doctrine of the inferior and secondary position of woman early became an integral part of Christianity. Its most emphatic manifestation is in church doctrines on marriage. As it was a cardinal tenet that the fall of Adam took place through his temptation into marriage by Eve, this relation was regarded with horror as a continuance of the evil that first brought sin into the world. Woman was an unclean one, the seducer who brought sin into the world and caused the fall of man. Consequently all apostles and fathers of the church regarded marriage as an inevitable evil just as we regard prostitution to-day. Marriage was an inferior and reprehensible state. Celibacy was a condition of holiness. It would be difficult to conceive anything more coarse and repulsive than the manner in which marriage was regarded by the church. It was regarded only in its very lowest aspect. St. Augustine, while admitting the possibility of salvation for the married, yet speaking of a mother and daughter in heaven compared the former to a star of the second magnitude, but represented the latter as shining with prime brilliancy. While the possibility of salvation to the married was at first recognized, it was denied at later date even to persons otherwise living holy lives. The emperor Jovian banished a man who asserted the possibility of salvation to married persons provided they obeyed all the ordinances of the church and lived good lives. As part of this doctrine, the church taught that woman was under an especial curse and man a divinely appointed agent for the enforcement of that curse. It inculcated the belief that all restrictions placed upon her were but parts of her just punishment for having caused the fall of man. Under such teaching a belief in the supreme virtue of celibacy—first declared by the Apostle Paul—was firmly established. To Augustine is the world indebted for full development of the theory of original sin, promulgated by Paul as a doctrine of the Christian church. Paul gave to the Christian world a lever long enough to reach down through eighteen centuries, all that time moving it in opposition to a belief in woman's created and religious equality with man, to her right of private judgment and to her personal freedom. His teaching that Adam, first created, was not first in sin, divided the unity of the human race in the assumption that woman was not part of the original creative idea but a secondary thought, an inferior being brought into existence as an appendage to man. Everything connected with woman was held to be unclean. It is stated that Agathro desired the Sophist Herodes to get ready for him the next morning a vessel full of pure milk, that is to say which had not been milked by the hand of a woman. But he perceived as soon as it was offered to him that it was not such as he desired, protesting that the scent of her hands who had milked it offended his nostrils. In the oldest European churches great distinction was made between the purity of man and woman. At an early date woman was forbidden to receive the eucharist into her naked hand on account of her impurity, or to sing in church on account of her inherent wickedness. To such an extent was this opposition carried, that the church of the Middle Ages did not hesitate to provide itself with eunuchs in order to supply cathedral choirs with the soprano tones inhering by nature in woman alone. One of the principal charges against the Huguenots was that they permitted women to sing in church, using their voices in praise of God contrary to the express command of St. Paul, Catherine de Medicis reproaching them for this great sin. The massacre at St. Bartholomew, when thirty thousand men, women, and children lost their lives, and the entire destruction of many families of purest character took place, with an additional great loss to France from the self-imposed banishment of hundreds more, may be traced to the teaching of St. Paul that woman should keep silence in the church. This doctrine also crossed the ocean with the Puritan fathers, and has appeared in America under many forms. The Christianity of the ages teaching the existence of a superior and inferior sex, possessing different rights under the law and in the church, it has been easy to bring man and woman under accountability to a different code of morals. For this double code the church is largely indebted to the subtle and acute Paul, who saw in the new religion but an enlarged Judaism that should give prominence to Abraham and his seed from whom Christ claimed descent. His conversion did not remove his old Jewish contempt for woman, as shown in his temple service, the law forbidding her entrance beyond the outer court. Nor could he divest himself of the spirit of the old morning prayer which duly led each Jew to thank God that he was not born a heathen, a slave, or a woman. He brought into the new dispensation the influence of the old ceremonial law, which regarded woman as unclean. The Jewish exclusion of forty days from even the outer court of the sanctuary to the woman who had given birth to a son, and of twice that period, or eighty days, if a daughter had been born, was terminated in both religions by a sin-offering in expiation of the mother's crime for having, at the peril of her own, brought another human being into life. This Old Testament teaching degraded the life-giving principle exemplified in motherhood, and in a twofold way lessened the nation's regard for womanhood. First, through the sin-offering and purification demanded of the mother; second, by its doubling the period of exclusion from the temple in case a girl was given to the world. The influence of church teaching is most strikingly manifested in the thought of to-day. Without predetermined intention of wrong-doing, man has been so molded by the church doctrine of ages and the coordinate laws of state as to have become blind to the justice of woman's demand for freedom such as he possesses. Nor is woman herself scarcely less bound, although now torn by the spirit of rebellion which burnt in the hearts of her foremothers, so cruelly persecuted, so falsely judged, during past ages, when the most devout Christian woman possessed no rights in the church, the government, or the family. The learning which had been hers in former periods was then interdicted as an especial element of evil. Her property rights recognized in former periods were then denied; as a being subordinate to man she was not allowed a separate estate or control over the earnings of her own hands. Her children were not her own but those of a master for whose interest or pleasure she had given them birth. Without freedom of thought or action, trained to consider herself secondary to man, a being who came into the world not as part of the great original plan of creation but as an afterthought of her creator, and this doctrine taught as one of the most sacred mysteries of religion which to doubt was to insure her eternal damnation, it is not strange that the great body of women are not now more outspoken in demanding equal religious and governmental rights with man. The establishment of the celibacy of the clergy was directly opposite to the promotion of purity. The priests, denied marriage, practiced criminal intercourse with the wives and daughters of their whole neighborhoods. The rightful state of marriage being discountenanced, its place was supplied by the wrongful states of fornication, adultery, concubinage, and prostitution. Morals sank fearfully low.

Chapter III is on Canon Law. The canon law of the church teemed with features of baneful effect. The church made the legitimacy of marriage dependent on her control of the ceremony. A change from ancient civilization to renewed barbarism was perceived and noted by historians at an early point of the Christian era, but its cause was unperceived. The cause was the extension of the canon law. The clergy became a distinct legal body from the laity, with different rights. Canon law grew rapidly in England, and the separation of ecclesiastical courts from civil was, says Blackstone, one of the most notable legal events of that country. Learning was prohibited to women. The oath of seven persons was required to convict a priest. Daughters could be disinherited, but sons could not. The Reformation continued the same principles. The catering of the nations to Pope Leo XIII. at the time of his jubilee was shameful. The sending him a gift by the president of the United States was disgraceful.

Chapter IV is on Marquette. This was the legal right of the feudal lords to pass the first night or nights with the new-made bride of each of their tenants. This right existed both in the civil and the ecclesiastical law. Church dignitaries were often feudal lords also, and in this case they claimed this privilege the same as the rest. The immorality of the heads of the Roman, Greek, and Protestant churches is recited. This subject of marquette is followed by that of the immorality of modern Christian society. Shocking cases such as those of the Pall Mall Gazette disclosures, the West End of London, Eton, and the Northwestern pineries of the United States are described. The foreign traffic in young English girls is related. There is, it is stated, an immense number of child criminals. The church has aided in all this. Her tendency was from the first toward the employment of woman for salaciousness. Among other citations is that of the baptism of women nude by the early church.

Chapter V is the history of Witchcraft. The possession of a pet of any kind was dangerous to a woman. The fact of any woman's possessing knowledge brought her under the suspicion of the church. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted and suppressed by the church. The persecution of women as witches was introduced into America by the Pilgrim fathers. These persons also whipped women half nude for their religious opinions.

Chapter VI is on Wives. Under Christianity wives held a position much more restricted and servile than previously. Daughters were sold into marriage, and wives sold or traded from one husband to another like cattle. Murder of a husband by a wife was styled petit treason and punished by burning alive, while murder of a wife by a husband was condoned. Marital infidelity of a husband went unrebuked, but of a wife was allowed to be punished with instant death by the husband. Husbands controlled wives' property. Husbands controlled wives' religion. Women were not admitted as witnesses. They were not permitted to read the Bible.

Chapter VII handles Polygamy. Our present system of marriage of one husband to one wife was not produced, as is claimed, by the Christian church. It was brought about by other causes. It is of undisputed historic record that both the Christian church and the Christian state in different centuries and under differing circumstances gave their influence in favor of polygamy. These instances are here related by Mrs. Gage in detail. An account of Mormon polygamy follows.

Chapter VIII discusses Woman and Work. Women have been degraded to mental and base labors. The work of women during pregnancy causes injury to the offspring.

In Chapter IX The Church of To-Day is exposed in its perniciousness. Its opposition to woman's elevation and its thousand other faults are noted. "The opposition of the church to woman's education," says Mrs. Gage, "has killed off the inhabitants of the world with greater rapidity than war, famine, or pestilence."

Chapter X surveys The Past, Present, and Future aspects of the matter.

The book is a valuable treasure-house of facts. It is of interest and use to the student of church history, of woman's history, and of the history of the state.

Not the least among its uses is that if placed in women's hands it is calculated to turn them from the church better than almost any other book that we have seen.

GHOST OF ST. JOHNS.

Gems of Thought.

TRASON doth never prosper: what's the reason?

Why, if it prosper none dare call it treason. —Anon.

TRUTH has inalienable rights. Just as it is never out of season to search for it, so it can never be out of season to defend it. —Voltaire.

MAN can only be a gainer and not a loser both intellectually and morally by the spread of knowledge and education and by the disappearance of superstitious ideas. To refuse to recognize this is to run counter to all reason and all history. Popular theories about the government of the world and immortality may change and take whatever forms they like: human society will not be changed for all that, and will not come to grief. —Buchner.

VOLTAIRE was the champion of the oppressed and the helpless. He was the Cæsar to whom the victims of church and state appealed. He stood for the intellect and heart of his time. From a great height he surveyed the world. His horizon was large. He had some vices—these he shared in common with priests—his virtues were his own. He was in favor of universal education, of the development of the brain. The church despised him. He wished to put the knowledge of the whole world within the reach of all. Every priest was his enemy. He wished to drive from the gate of Eden the cherubim of superstition so that the children of Adam might return and eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge. The church opposed this because it had the fruit of the tree of ignorance for sale. —Ingersoll.

WHILE the eye and the ear vary little in structure in different individuals, the variations in mental structure are endless, being determined by our environment, education, and inherited peculiarities. Color-blindness is comparatively rare and limited to a few colors; psychical blindness, in a greater or less degree, is a defect no man is free from. The simpler illustrations of this law need not detain us. We put any new phenomenon into that class of our previous notions which it most closely resembles. A child who sees a cow for the first time calls it a horse, if familiar with horses. The same plant may be perceived by a girl as a flower, by a farmer as a weed, by an old woman as an herb. The story of the precocious boy is in point. He sat under a tree as three strangers passed by. The first said, "What a fine stick of timber!" "Good-morning, carpenter," said the boy. The second, "What excellent bark!" "Good-morning, tanner." The third, "What a beautiful tree-top!" "Good-morning, artist." He had correctly interpreted their vocations from their manner of perceiving the tree. Our habits of thought, once started, grow on any food. We go by chance to hear a lecturer of an opposite party or sect, and come away confirmed in our own views. This law of mental inertia tends constantly to produce one-sidedness. Nature strives ever to rectify this tendency by presenting to us an unsorted variety of details, and succeeds in keeping most of us within the bounds of sanity, though not of perfect balance. —Professor Patrick on The Psychology of Prejudice.

It was stated by friends of Lincoln that he generally refrained from giving publicity to his religious opinions while in public life because of their unpopularity. In answer to this the Christian claimant retorts: "If this be true then he was a hypocrite." But let us be honest. Nearly every person entertains opinions which he does not deem it discreet or necessary to make public. You, my Christian friend, entertain doubts and heresies concerning your creed which you keep a secret or disclose only to your most intimate associates. If you, in private life, and not dependent upon the public, hide your unpopular thoughts from the world, can you consistently blame Lincoln for his silence when the fate of a nation depended upon him and the alienation even of a few bigots might turn the scales against him? Again, the clergy are forever advising and entreating men not to publish their doubts and heresies. Is it consistent in them to condemn a man for following their advice? The church should learn to respect honesty herself before she charges others with dishonesty. It is the shame of Christianity that men have been obliged to conceal their honest convictions in order to escape ostracism and persecution. When the church herself becomes honest enough to tolerate and respect the honest opinions of those who cannot conscientiously accept her creed, then will it be time for her to charge Lincoln with hypocrisy for having partially withheld his unpopular views from religious ruffians. —Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian? by John E. Remsburg.

FREETHINKERS' PICTORIAL TEXT-BOOK.

SHOWING

THE ABSURDITY AND UNTRUTHFULNESS OF THE CHURCH'S CLAIM TO BE A DIVINE AND BENEFICENT INSTITUTION, AND REVEALING THE ABUSES OF A UNION OF CHURCH AND STATE.

185 Full-Page Illustrations.

WITH COPIOUS CITATIONS OF FACTS, HISTORY, STATISTICS, AND OPINIONS OF SCHOLARS TO MAINTAIN THE ARGUMENT OF THE ARTIST.

DESIGNS BY WATSON HESTON WITH PORTRAIT OF THE DESIGNER.

The illustrations are classified as follows:

26 represent Uncle Sam and the Priests.	2 represent Samples of Christianity's Work.
1 The Church Robbing the People.	5 Missionaries.
1 Thanksgiving.	1 The Lord's Instruments.
1 Sabbath Laws.	25 Bible Doctrines and Their Results.
1 Children and the Church.	1 The Church and Slavery.
1 Woman and the Church.	2 Priests and Politics.
1 The Church and Thomas Paine.	4 Ireland and the Church.
1 Studies in Natural History.	3 Church's Idea of Civilization.
1 The Bible and Science.	1 The Uses of the Cross.
1 The Clergy and Their Flocks.	4 Unkind Reflections on the Church.
1 Piety in Our Penitentiaries.	9 Persecutions of the Church.
1 The Atonement Scheme.	12 Some Allegories.
1 The Lord and His Works.	3 Heaven.
1 Prayer.	6 Hell.
1 The Creeds.	7 Miscellaneous.
1 Christians and Mohammedans.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

MEDICAL.

If you need a medicine pay attention to something which will cure you. It is known as

The Water of Life,

and is adapted to curing, more especially, all forms of Stomach, Liver, Kidney, and Bladder troubles. By injecting this water it will heal all sorts of inflammations of the internal organs, such cases as Piles, Typhoid and other fevers, Bowel diseases, Uterine and other forms of Female Complaints. It is a Blood Purifier, and is an excellent remedy for Catarrh and Lung and Throat inflammations. It will heal the nerves, restoring lost vigor of mind and body, creating a good appetite and producing sound sleep. It acts steadily upon the urine, cleansing the blood by means of the kidneys, and acts mildly upon the bowels, thereby producing bodily habits which are so essential to good health. This is sold absolutely pure, as it is pumped from the spring, without the addition of any drug whatever. It is Nature's Remedy, pure and simple, and not a manufactured article. The success it has achieved has come mostly from its friends who have been cured by using it. Send for a pamphlet free, containing photo-engraved letters and recommendations from those who have used it, giving a forty-page history and all particulars about this remarkable water, to

Water of Life

News of the Week.

THE Minnesota supreme court has affirmed the right to boycott.

SINCE Steve Brodie jumped from high bridges about New York city, emulation to equal him has prevailed. Brodie invoked no supernatural protection, and was unharmed. Last week Matthew Rooney blessed himself, making signs of the cross, and jumped. The hospital authorities say that he may live.

ON the animosity between Christians and Hebrews in the Jewish quarter of New York, a court judge says: "There will be a 'Red sea' if many more Jews come here to live. The Christians and Hebrews are at sword's points now around here, and an outbreak may occur at any time. The police have all they can do to keep peace among the people now, and if many more Jews get in here they will have a hard task."

IN an English court a husband who was sued for divorce pleaded that he was the injured party. He was, he said, not so well up in theological subjects as his wife, and when they were talking over sermons they had heard she became offended if his opinions were not like hers. One is not surprised after this, says the account, to hear that one of the allegations against the respondent is that he had struck the petitioner with the Methodist Magazine.

THE Jews of Yalta, Russia, refused to obey the decree to retire within the Pale. For several days the Greek Catholic clergy exhorted the rest of the population to rise and expel them. Last week an anti-Jew mob took possession of the streets, broke into houses occupied by Jews, and tried to drive the occupants from the town. The Jews fought back. Dozens were dragged into the streets and were beaten. Many were killed. The houses owned by Jews were plundered and wrecked.

At Fabriz, Persia, Mirza-Ibrahim, a convert from Mohammedanism to Christianity, has died from ill treatment received in prison, where he had been confined a year on account of his conversion. His wife and property had been taken away, and he was placed in chains and with his feet in stocks. An account says: "With him were twelve desperate fellows. They became angry and took turns in choking him with their fingers and asking him 'Is it Isa (Jesus) or Ali?' To this question he invariably answered 'Isa,' and then they would choke him again."

THE new liquor system of South Carolina is thought very despotic by favorers of personal liberty all over the country. The clubs are forbidden to sell liquor to their members, and have built lockers in which each member keeps his stock separately and helps himself. But a rod is in pickle for these clubs. Not only is it impossible to treat a friend or brother member to a drink without breach of the new law, but if the law is strictly construed it is illegal to maintain any except a blue-ribbon club. Treating is forbidden by a phrase which makes it illegal to distribute or give away liquor, and clubs are aimed at again in the clause which declares that a place where men associate to keep liquor may be adjudged a nuisance.

AN intimate friend of Governor Altgeld says "there is now being made ready for the printer a pamphlet in which the governor will go into an exhaustive review of the Anarchists' case. He will reaffirm that the men were tried by a prejudiced judge and a jury selected to convict. He will outline in detail the alleged conspiracy among the police to manufacture evidence and suborn witnesses to testify against Spies and his comrades. He will print, I am told, the names of the rich men who contributed to a secret fund to be used to aid the prosecution and the amounts they gave respectively. He will assert that an immense sum was to be divided among certain parties in the event of the conviction of the Anarchists, and that no means were left untried by some of the parties in interest to earn this reward."

A REBELLION in Kansas is feared. The governor is charged by conservatives and capitalists with now being plotting one. He has, they say, been "squaring himself" with what the governor's enemies call the most vicious element in the state. Not only has he, say his accusers, through his subordinate officials directed the strike among the coal miners now in progress, but he has invaded the penitentiary and has pardoned men who have returned to their former homes to terrorize all those who were instrumental in securing their incarceration. In all these pardons, say the governor's accusers, "the criminals had been guilty of gross offenses, and they have come from communities in which the Populists have the strongest hold. Take the entire list and you will find this to be the case. Then, too, those pardoned are the ones who have the most influence with a certain class,"

By COL. JOHN R. KELSO.

Contents: Derivations and Definitions of Political Terms; Various Forms of Government; General Principles of Government; Functions of Government; Origin of Government; Declaration of Independence; Articles of Confederation; Defects of the Confederation; Formation of the Constitution of the United States; Taxation; Tariff for Protection; War; Punishment; Marriage; Religion; Prohibition; Money; What a Government Should Be.

Those who know Col. Kelso's keen analytical power, as shown in his "Bible Analyzed" and "Deity Analyzed," will realize that in "Government Analyzed," they will have the bedrock of human authority exposed, and will learn what government is. Whether they will agree with his statement of what government is depends upon whether they lean to Socialistic or Anarchistic philosophy. But at all events everyone can learn something from this book.

THE HOLY CROSS SERIES.

The Popes and Their Doings. Biographical sketches of the most noted of these vicars of Christ and viceregents of God, showing what they have done, and what kind of men they were. It contains very plain statements, in very unvarnished language, and the unmasking is complete, proving them to have been cruel, intriguing, and licentious men. Considering the rapid growth of Catholicism in this country, this book cannot be too widely disseminated. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Awful Disclosures of Maria Monk, as exhibited in a narrative of her sufferings during her residence of five years as a novice, and two years as a black nun, in the Hotel Dieu Nunnery, at Montreal. Perhaps not any anti-Catholic book published has created more excitement, and had such a circulation as this work. To counteract its effects the Catholics circulated a story that Maria Monk was "no better than she should be," but investigation disclosed that her "child of shame" was none other than the child of her priest-seducer. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth 75 cents.

Auricular Confession and Popish Nunneries. By Wm. Hogan, for twenty-five years a confessing priest. A revelation of the licentious practices of the priests and nuns in these religious brothels. There is no question that Ex-priest Hogan knew the truth of the tales of vice, seduction, and infanticide he gives in this volume, and equally there is no question that if the people generally knew of them, Catholicism would not be given the vast amounts of money now allowed it by our various city governments. Price, paper, 50 cents, cloth. 75 cents.

The Priest in Absolution. A Review of the system of auricular confession, including copious extracts from the "Confessional Unmasked," from the "Master Key to Popery," etc. The work is a protest against and an appeal to every American citizen to examine carefully and thoughtfully a religious system so invasive of privacy, so powerful for evil in licentious hands, so fraught with danger to female modesty, to the ingenuous openness of youth, and to the freedom of thought, speech, and action. Price, paper, 25 cents.

Priestly Celibacy Exposed. A lecture by the Rev. Geo. Townsend Fox, of Durham, England. Revised American edition, showing the result in parishes of the Roman decree that priests shall not marry. Price, paper, 15 cents.

Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures Respecting New Hall Convent, Boreham, Essex, England. Showing that convents are inimical to chastity, virtue, and freedom. Price, paper, 10 cents.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

Woman's Building.	Art Palace.	Fisheries Building.
Administration Building.	Manufactures and Liberal	Agricultural Building.
Electrical Building.	Arts Building.	Transportation Building.
Machinery Hall.	Mines and Mining Building.	Horticultural Building.
	Forestry Building.

A visitor to the Fair says of this book—reading it in THE TRUTH SEEKER—that it is charming and to one who has seen the Fair vastly entertaining.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution; that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labors unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

The Church Opposed the Discovery of America.

If a political club exhorts one of its members not to vote for a principle of an opposit party, profusely argues against and ridicules that principle, and finally points threateningly to a long line of victims whom it has murdered for so voting, and then the member does vote for the principle in spite of them and good comes of it, then for the club to claim the credit of that good is monstrous.

If the government of Russia exhorts one of its subjects not to leave the bounds of that country, profusely argues against and ridicules leaving, and finally points threateningly to a long line of victims whom it has murdered for so leaving, and then the subject does leave in spite of them and good comes of it, then for the Russian government to claim the credit of that good is monstrous.

If the Catholic church exhorts Columbus not to entertain the notion that a certain voyage is possible, profusely argues against and ridicules that notion, and finally points threateningly to a long line of victims whom it has murdered for entertaining the notion, and then Columbus does cherish the notion in spite of them and good comes of it, then for the church to claim the credit of that good is monstrous.

Of such a monstrosity is the claim that the Catholic church is now making everywhere in the land. It is taking to itself the glory of Columbus's discovery, merely because he was a member of that institution. It is by this claim strengthening the reverent admiration of its myriad devotees.

Of the principal conclave at which Columbus's doctrine was considered, the Encyclopedia Britannica says: "Fernando de Talavera . . . in 1487 summoned a junta of astronomers and cosmographers to confer with Columbus, and examine his design and the arguments by which he supported it. The Dominicans of San Estebán in Salamanca entertained Columbus during the conference. The jurors, who were most of them ecclesiastics, were by no means unprejudiced, nor were they disposed to abandon their pretensions to knowledge without a struggle. Columbus argued his point, but was overwhelmed with biblical texts, with quotations from the great divines, with theological objections, and in a short time the junta was adjourned. . . . In 1490 the junta decided that his project was vain and impracticable, and that it did not become their highnesses to have anything to do with it."

A fuller account will benefit us. This we may have from Prof. A. D. White, from Washington Irving, and others, transferring to our own page some of the graceful periods of that admirable American biographer Irving. The council was held in the Dominican convent of St. Stephen. Of the permeation and control of all things at that time by theology, Irving says: "Religion and science were at that time, and more especially in that country, closely associated. The treasures of learning were immured in monasteries, and the professors' chairs were exclusively filled from the cloister. The domination of the clergy extended over the state as well as the church, and posts of honor and influence at court, with the exception of hereditary nobles, were almost entirely confined to ecclesiastics. It was even common to find bishops in helm and corselet at the head of armies. . . . Spain surpassed all other countries of Christendom in the fervor of her devotion. The Inquisition had just been established in that kingdom, and every opinion that savored of heresy made its owner obnoxious to odium and persecution."

Such was the period when a council of clerical sages was convened in the collegiate convent of St. Stephen, to investigate the new theory of Columbus. It was composed of professors of astronomy, geography, mathematics, and other branches of science, together with various dignitaries of the church, and learned friars. Before this churchly assembly, Columbus presented himself to propound and defend his conclusions. We are told by Remesal, in his "Hist. de Chiapa," that when Columbus began to state the grounds of his belief, the friars of St. Stephen alone paid attention to him; that convent being more learned in the sciences than the rest of the university. Objections quickly showered down on the broacher of the new idea. Several of the objections proposed by this Bible-learned body have been handed down to us; they are, says Irving, "proofs of the imperfect state of science at the time, and the manner in which knowledge, though rapidly extending, was still impeded in its progress by monastic bigotry. All subjects were still contemplated through the obscure medium of those ages when the lights of antiquity were trampled out and faith was left to fill the place of inquiry. Bewildered in a maze of religious controversy, mankind had retraced their steps, and receded from the boundary line of ancient knowledge. Thus, at the very threshold of the discussion, instead of geographical objections, Columbus was assailed with citations from the Bible and the Testament: the book of Genesis, the Psalms of David, the prophets, the epistles, and the gospels. To these were added the expositions of various saints and reverend commentators: St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine, St. Jerome and St. Gregory, St. Basil and St. Ambrose, and Lactantius Firmianus, a redoubted champion of the faith. Doctrinal points were mixed up with philosophical discussion, and a mathematical demonstration was allowed no weight, if it appeared to clash with a text of scripture, or a commentary of one of the fathers. Thus the possibility of the antipodes, in the southern hemisphere, . . . became a stumbling-block with some of the sages of Salamanca. Several of them stoutly contradicted this fundamental position of Columbus, supporting themselves by quotations from Lactantius and St. Augustine, who were considered in those days as almost evangelical authority." Of Lactantius, that bestudied and venerated father, Irving remarks, not merely that his weight was against Columbus's theory, but that his writings were "calculated to perpetuate darkness in respect to the sciences" in general.

Objections of a graver nature were advanced against Columbus on the authority of St. Augustine. He pronounces the doctrine of antipodes to be incompatible with the historical foundations of our faith; since, to assert that there were inhabited lands on the opposite side of the globe, would be to maintain that there were nations not descended from Adam, it being impossible for them to have passed the intervening ocean. This would be, therefore, to discredit the Bible, which expressly declares that all men are descended from one common parent.

Such, says Irving, were the unlooked-for prejudices which Columbus had to encounter at the very outset of his conference, and which certainly relish more of the convent than the university. To his simplest proposition, the spherical form of the earth, were opposed figurative texts of scripture. They observed that in the Psalms (civ, 3) the heavens are said to be extended like a hide, that is, according to commentators, the curtain or covering of a tent, which, among the ancient pastoral nations, was formed of the hides of animals; and that St. Paul, in his epistle to the Hebrews, compares the heavens to a tabernacle, or tent, extended over the earth, which they thence inferred must be flat.

Irving's account concludes with the mark-worthy statement that "Columbus, who was a devoutly religious man, found that he was in danger of being convicted not merely of error, but of heterodoxy."

Columbus's discovery, like every other action of benefit to man, was performed not in accordance with, but in spite of, the teachings of the church.

The Closing of the Fair.

Our Congregational contemporary emerges from obscurity to remark:

"Sunday closing is a bitter defeat to the handful of Infidels represented by THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is a great deal of significance in these words of that anti-religious sheet: 'The jubilation of the Sabbatarians is indescribable.' And there is a strain of sadness in its reflection that Sunday closing will prevent 'great masses of our people' from 'entertaining and elevating themselves.' This is too bad; but these 'masses' did not take advantage of the opportunity when they had it. The Fair was open several Sundays, but the 'masses' did not attend it."

The Independent needn't feel so almightily tickled over the closing. It is not a triumph the Christians can feel proud of. They were beaten fairly and squarely on the question, and now the closing is due to their meanness in working upon the exhibitors and inducing them to cover up their exhibits. The Sabbatarians have resorted to bullying, boycotting, and threatening, and the directors have been weak enough to yield. The reason the masses did not attend was because they were not fools enough to pay full price to see half the show. With half the exhibits closed the admission ought to have been cut in two.

The moral effect of the whole business is, notwithstanding the closing now, a victory for liberty. It has been rendered barren by the meanness, bigotry, clannishness, and general cussedness of the orthodox. They are a perpetual source of danger to the republic, to the people's liberty and welfare, to human freedom.

But it is consoling to know that the masses who did not attend the emasculated Fair do not attend the churches now that the Fair is shut. Instead they go to the theaters and to the parks. And we are sorry to add, Sunday closing of the Fair drove thousands to the saloons. The liquor-dealers profit more than the churches. If the church had as much desire to do good as she has to tyrannize she would dissolve that partnership.

We had written thus far when news comes that the Fair is not closed Sundays, and may not be, though it probably will, for the reasons given before—the bulldozing of the churches. On Friday, the 28th, the council of administration ordered the Fair open, pending the settlement of the Clingman injunction suit. Probably this week the matter will be decided permanently. Until the Clingman injunction against closing is disposed of it is illegal to close it. Yet Mr. Crafts, for the Sabbatarians, sent this dispatch to the council of administration:

"PITTSBURG, July 29th.

"Any possible penalty for contempt of court in closing to-morrow in accordance with law will be a trifle to the cost of incurring the everlasting contempt of the country for inefficiency or trickery in recent dealing with Stein injunction, if it results in even one reopening.

"In behalf of National Sabbath-closing committee, "WILBUR F. CRAFTS, Chairman.

"S. H. GEORGE, Secretary."

"The people who sent that message certainly cannot understand the situation we are in," said President Higinbotham to a reporter. "They think we are tricking with the injunction and are immodest enough to say so. They seem also to think that it would be better for all of us to go to jail for disobedience of that injunction than to incur their displeasure by keeping the Fair open.

"In other words, these Christian people don't want us to obey the law. They want us to still further disobey the mandate of the courts. It would seem to be everyone's duty to support us in obedience to the law rather than to counsel any more infractions. It is probable that Judge Stein will punish us for what we have done already. I shall be disappointed if he does not. Certainly, if I were in his place and he in mine, I should visit some punishment on him. I don't think that my position, my wealth, or my connection with the Fair ought to shield me in the least. And, as I said, I shall be disappointed if Judge Stein does not punish us all."

So it is seen that the World's Fair Sunday question is not at rest, and the Independent is premature in its chuckling. But, whether it is closed or not, the fact remains that the bigots were defeated in the open fight and now win by measures which in others they condemn vehemently. The moral effect is with Liberalism.

Not to Bring Peace but a Sword.

One of the surest signs of contentment and prosperity in any country, says the Russian traveler Kennan, is the absence of extraordinary and exceptional legislation, and particularly of legislation intended to silence criticism, to prevent discussion, and to repress all forms of political activity. If the people of a country are satisfied and prosperous, there is no necessity for severe repressive measures, because there is no popular discontent to repress. Is this absence of exceptional legislation, inquires the able Kennan, characteristic of the present situation in Russia? It appears from the semi-official journals of civil and criminal law in St. Petersburg and Moscow that a large part of the empire, including its most thickly-settled provinces and nearly all its large cities, has been in a state of siege, or, as we should say, under martial law, ever since the present emperor came to the throne. It appears that throughout a period of nearly twelve years Russian governors, governor-generals, and chiefs of police have had authority to issue "imperative orders" with regard to all matters that concern the maintenance of public tranquillity or the safety of the state; to prohibit all public, social, or even private meetings and assemblies; to direct the closing of all commercial and industrial establishments; to remove cases from the civil to the military courts whenever in their opinion such a course is necessary; to arrest and imprison without judicial warrant and upon mere suspicion; to make searches and seizures in all dwellings, factories, foundries, etc., without exception, and, finally, to recommend the banishment to Siberia of any person whose character seems to them obnoxious, or whose presence is regarded by the police as "prejudicial to public order."

Martial law, goes on this traveler, "in civilized countries is not a permanent institution; it is a last resort in time of war, tumult, or disorder, when the comparatively slow and formal processes of the civil courts are not adequate to meet the dangerous and swiftly-arising emergencies of the hour. But martial law has existed in Russia for twelve years in a time of profound peace, and seems likely to last for a quarter of a century. What are the reasons for it? Is Russian society in such a state of tumult or disorder that the civil courts can no longer control it?"

Russia is the most thoroughly Christian nation in Europe. Yet we see that she is the most turbulent. The Christians' designation for their faith, "the religion of peace," is, like all their utterances on religion, the exact opposite of the truth. Wherever Christianity has most prevailed disorders and violence have most abounded. This is shown equally by the history of the past and by a survey of the nations of the present.

Religion Is a Friend of Disease.

The Catholic Review says:

"Cholera is raging in Senegal, Smyrna, and Naples. Its germs have not all been destroyed. They may be brought to this port. It is well to be prepared. The best preparation is a conscience at peace with God."

This is the genuine Christian doctrine on disease. The best preparation for it in any of its varieties is, the clergy have always taught, a conscience at peace with God, or a spirit endeavoring to serve God, or a fat gift to the coffers of the agents of God. Not a word did the church ever speak, in the old days when she was supreme, on the true, scientific preparations for disease, and how little she is disposed to recognize them now her sentiments like the above testify.

It is solely because of the teachings of religion on the subject that epidemics exist now. The progress made within a very few years by ignoring supernaturalism and instituting scientific measures has been such as to warrant us in inferring that had this movement not been deferred to this late day by the long reign of superstition, all contagious diseases would now be practically extirpated. The cholera breaks out each time about Mecca, the holy city of the Mohammedans. It is bred there by Mohammedan pilgrims, determined to perform the ceremonies of their religion and utterly indifferent to instruction on the physical perils often involved therein. We have called attention to the fact before. A late account says that at Mecca it has become impossible to bury the dead, and the bodies of the wretched pilgrims lie in the streets and on the roads between that city and neighboring towns. Such is the condition of a place only a few hundred miles from the Suez canal, the cities of Egypt, and the eastern end of the Mediterranean. Such has been its condition repeatedly in the last twenty years, and from Mecca and the other "holy places" at the head of the Persian gulf cholera has repeatedly been carried into Europe and from Europe to America, causing enormous loss of life and property. It has not recently gone westward by way of the Suez canal and Egypt, thanks to the labors of the Egyptian Sanitary council, but from those nurseries of pestilence imported from India the path through the dominions of the sultan and the shah has been unobstructed. The account of which we speak says:

"The points at which the westward movement of Indian cholera should be checked are, first, the Indian ports at which pilgrims embark for Mecca and other 'holy places,' and second, these 'holy places' themselves on the Red sea and at the head of the Persian gulf. If the transmission of the disease to the 'holy places' cannot be prevented, then the European powers should take possession of the 'holy places' or compel the sultan to place them under the supervision of sanitary commissions appointed by a European sanitary alliance."

Restraint upon "holy places" and holy things of all kinds is, to tell the truth, the chief factor in the advance of civilization. About every advance in knowledge, morals, or health that mankind has made will on examination be found to be an abatement of a holy something and a substitution of devotion to an unholy one.

Another account points out the chief of the religious rituals by which cholera is spread at Mecca. At that city, it says, the chief agent for spreading infection is an ancient and "holy" and unutterably filthy well, from which each pilgrim believes it to be his duty to drink. It is little better than a cess-pool. Mecca has a fair water supply, and the powers, urges this writer, should insist upon assuming control of the city, so far as sanitation is concerned. They should prevent the use of water from this well, and subject both residents and pilgrims to rigid sanitary supervision. Great Britain should take the lead in this work, and should begin with the enforcement of sanitary laws with respect to the shipment of pilgrims from India on the steamships of English companies.

And from another report we see that "the ordinary sanitary laws are disregarded in Mecca as in other cities of the Mohammedan world; anything like scientific treatment of the cholera is unknown; the fatalistic believers regard a visitation of it as the decree of Allah; they are willing that it shall bring them death, if they but die within view of the holy city or on the way thereto, as paradise is assured to them. The cholera was in Mecca last year; it is almost as constant there as it is in the delta of the Ganges. It often rages fiercely there without approaching any part of Europe."

Finally let us note down, to satisfy Christians what lack of benefit there is in prayer, that when in Hamburg, Germany, the people gathered in churches and prayed for remittance of the pestilence, that very act produced the exacerbation of the disease. The story is told by Miss Annesley Kinealy, appointed judge of the hygienic section in the World's Fair by the ladies' committee of the royal commission. Returning from an investigation of the situation in Europe, she says: "In the Hamburg epidemic I acted as nurse in a hospital where there were two thousand patients. We noticed that every Monday morning there was an alarming increase in the number of new cases. It soon became evident that these were largely due to the congregation of persons at the churches, beer gardens, and other resorts. So convinced of this became the authorities that they ordered the people to avoid assembling so far as possible. The churches were closed and so were all the other resorts. There was a diminution in the number of cases at once."

What Is More Mischievous Than a Preacher?

Strange as it may seem, there is something more meddlesome and vicious than a preacher—by that we mean a plain preacher, bearing no super-added function—and that is a missionary. Whoever will go to the pains to look up the careers of missionaries will find lives of mischievousness outstripping the suppositions even of the strongest-hating Infidel. The injurious conduct of missionaries on the Hawaiian islands has been such, pronounces the New York Times, as to "justify the severe sentence of Clarendon upon 'clergymen, who understand the least and take the worst measure of human affairs of all mankind that can write and read.'" Also, Col. Volney V. Ashford, one of the most prominent residents of Honolulu, has little respect for the Protestant missionaries in those islands. In a special report lately made by him to United States Commissioner Blount, he says that in case the islands be annexed to this country, they must be put on the footing of a territory, and he then adds: "There is here a bitter objection of the majority against any unusual plan such as is proposed in the treaty laid before the American Senate. The feeling is strong here that no American commissioner can fail to be influenced by the missionary party here, and that the proposed scheme of annexation would result in plutocratic rule of a half dozen men who came here poor to serve the cause of religion on starvation salaries and who have developed by thrift into a moneyed aristocracy, owning all the valuable lands and industries of the country. This class has always been the enemy of the native race, and their efforts to reduce the Kanakas to inferior political position, as well as their arrogance to those not so rich as themselves, have alienated all masses from them." Then, the Cook islands, in the Pacific, exhibit an instructive object-lesson of what clergy always do when they get the power. The earl of Onslow, giving an account in the British House of Lords the other night of this interesting archipelago, said he had once, while governor of New Zealand, procured a report upon one of the islands, Mangaia, by Mr. Moss. It showed that the missionaries made the law, and that church-membership was a requirement for office, from sovereign to policeman. Of these last there were one hundred and fifty-five, or one to every twelve of the people. All fines were paid to them, and among the fines were $5 for sorcery, and $5 for visiting a village not your own on Sunday. The natives had to pay dearly when caught in any of these offenses, and to extort evidence girls were shut up in holes, exposed to the torturing attacks in order that they might confess and be

The Anglican Church Combated Our Revolution.

The churches, fortunately, help us somewhat in our exposure of their misdeeds. They are not united, but separate, and are ever pointing to the delinquencies of one another. The Roman Catholic Freeman's Journal and Catholic Register has fished up out of O'Callaghan's "Documentary History of New York" a piece of writing evincing the hostility of the Church of England to the cause of our American Revolutionists a century ago. It is a statement, vouched for by the written authority of the rector of Trinity church, New York city, that all the Anglican missionaries of New York, New Jersey, and New England, without exception, did their best to stifle the aspirations of the American people. It is in the form of a letter written by an Anglican bishop:

"NEW YORK, Oct. 31, 1776.

"I have the pleasure to assure you that all the Society's missionaries, without excepting one, in New Jersey, New York, Connecticut, and, so far as I can learn, in the New England colonies, have proved themselves faithful, loyal subjects in these trying times, and have to the utmost of their power opposed the spirit of disaffection and rebellion which has involved this continent in the greatest calamities. I must add that all the other clergy of our church in the above colonies, though not in the Society's service, have observed the same line of conduct, and although their joint endeavors could not wholly prevent the rebellion, yet they checked it considerably for some time and prevented many thousands from plunging into it, who otherwise would certainly have done so.

"The present rebellion is certainly one of the most causeless, unprovoked, and unnatural that ever disgraced any country. A rebellion marked with peculiarly aggravated circumstances of guilt and ingratitude.

"I have not a doubt but, with the blessing of Providence, His Majesty's arms will be successful, and finally crush this unnatural rebellion. CHARLES INGLIS.

"THE REV. DR. HAND, London, Eng."

We are well suited to have clergymen show people how much their profession was against political liberty.

More About the Fair.

When Mr. Putnam had finished writing his description of the World's Fair he made a lecture trip Down East, as will be seen by his News and Notes on another page.

Having concluded his engagement there, he is paying New York a visit and writing his "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." In a week or two he will return to Chicago, spending the time between now and October on his book and writing us more about the Fair. After the International Congress he will make a lecture trip East and then turn his face westward, lecturing for his old friends and as many new ones as he may induce to listen. Mr. Putnam has immense capacity for good work, and he taxes it heavily. He is about the busiest man in the country.

A casual visitor to one evening session of a late Presbyterian assembly thinks that the general appearance of the commissioners was decidedly less intellectual than a meeting of the New York Academy of Medicine or a gathering of lawyers.

Oliver Sumner Teall, a young New Yorker popular with the four hundred notwithstanding a habit of speaking his mind, in giving his political experience says this: "There were more broils and backbitings and underhand tricks in the People's Municipal League, which was made up very largely of parsons, than in any organization I was ever in."

A literary man of a French-Canadian and Catholic part of Canada says: "Our people are beginning to see that the education imparted by the religious orders, whose members are not asked to pass an examination or produce any other evidence of their fitness to teach, is a poor article." Parochial education is such a poor article that every people under it has been found by advocates of the modern genuine school grossly and blackly ignorant, unable to read and write.

Buchanan sends to the London Chronicle a noble outburst. "Literature," he cries, "take care of itself, and contemporary judgments upon it are only the cacklings of geese in the capitol. A writer must be a dead man, either physically or morally, before the geese approve him. They hissed, until he was stiff and cold, the greatest of all living Americans, and when he was laid in his grave only one man, an Atheist by profession, had the courage to speak the funeral oration." By "the greatest of all living Americans," Buchanan means Walt Whitman, and by the "one man" who "had the courage to speak the funeral oration" Colonel Ingersoll.

We shall print next week an article by Otto Wettstein on "The Underlying Reality," in which he knocks the underpinning away from some of the unsubstantial idealists and metaphysicians who are building some pretty flimsy structures upon treacherous mental quicksands. Incidentally we may add that Miss Chapman made us a pleasant call recently and left word that she proposed in the near future to topple Mr. Wettstein over. Incidentally we may still further add that she has a much more difficult task than has Mr. Wettstein. One difficulty Miss Chapman labors under is that she isn't really much of a Christian, anyway. Her Theism is about all the orthodoxy she possesses, and bare Theism won't get people to the orthodox heaven, by any means.

The whereabouts of the editor of our Children's Corner may be inferred from the following from the Lake Sunapee, N. H., Echo: "Miss Susan H. Wixon, of Fall River, Mass., in company with her sister, Abethia M. Wixon, and her cousin, James Wixon, of New Bedford, arrived at the Ben Mere a week ago last Tuesday, and the ladies still remain, admiring the beauties of the lake and surroundings. Mr. Wixon, after a successful attack upon the fish in the lake, landing an eight-pound salmon, was obliged to return to his duty at New Bedford, leaving the ladies of the party to their own sweet will." Miss Susan is the authoress of a romance bearing the title, 'All in a Lifetime,' and a number of works deeply interesting to juvenile readers, such as 'Apples of Gold,' and 'The Story Hour.' She has been, for quite a number of years an honored member of the board of Education of Fall River; and is entirely absorbed in enterprises of an intellectual and meliorating character, on behalf of the lowly and the poor. She is slated to deliver an address on 'Woman's Day' at Chicago, early in October, on the theme: 'The Progress of Woman for Four Centuries.'

Four Hundred Years of Freethought.

The plan of putting the grand history of Freethought from 1492 to 1892 into a permanent book form, together with the International Congress of the World's Fair, meets with prompt and generous response. No doubt it will be a success, but we need to know at the earliest possible moment all who will join in the work. I want it understood that this will be no catch-penny affair. The book in every respect will be worth the money paid. I have counted up the number of portraits of Freethinkers for the book, and the number is nearly one hundred. This in itself will be worth the price, for it will be a picture gallery of the greatest reformers of the world, nowhere else to be obtained. Besides this there will be over five hundred pages of printed matter. The wealth of material is simply exhaustless, and my chief labor is to condense and give the main currents of progress in these four magnificent centuries. Besides, I intend as far as possible to have a list of all the Freethought organizations in the world and the work they are doing. The fact of it is, that no Freethinker can afford to do without this work. By securing a large number of subscribers before the Congress, we can so arrange as to publish the book in splendid fashion, and at the same time have quite a sum of money for the benefit of the Congress. It is a method of co-operation by which the subscriber gets a valuable return, and greatly aids the International Congress. Here are some of the letters I have received from all over the country:

WATERLOO, N. Y., July 11, 1893.

DEAR BROTHER PUTNAM: I hasten to meet you, to greet you, and bid you good-speed and send you $5 for your new book. I wanted to send this early fearing my age—eighty-seven—might prevent sending at all, and also would like to be the first subscriber to your "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am ever yours, HENRY BONNELL.

Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., writes:

I observe you offer your "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" for $5. Cheap enough. Every Liberal ought to be satisfied with the price. But little over $1 for every hundred years. Inclosed is my check for the volume.

Robert G. Ingersoll writes:

Of course I shall subscribe for your new book. Put my name down. Your letters from Chicago were immense.

John E. Remsburg sends word:

Inclosed $5. Put us down for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." Every Freethinker must have that book.

James A. Greenhill says:

DEAR BROTHER PUTNAM: Inclosed $5 for the book. I would have it if it cost twice the money. I wish you success and a rousing time in October.

John D. Powers, of Vermont, writes:

It is just what I would like. I send the money order.

In the interest of Freethought and honest thought I wish the work success. LOUIS LEVINE.

I think such a work is one of prime necessity and I am sure you will do it justice. M. O'B. WARD, M.D.

I like your vigorous style, and am sure your work will be a valuable addition to my library. Book me for a copy. E. LIVEZEY.

Says Franklin Steiner:

It will be a grand book. The theme itself is grand. Put my name down.

N. F. Griswold writes:

Of course I want your "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," for I think it will have more real merit, and more light of truth on the future pathway of progress than all the noted New York's "Four Hundred."

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: My heart's desire is that you will be liberally and heartily indorsed. I am a subscriber for your book. Yours always, JAMES TURNER.

Bennet Anderson joins:

Sure, my brother, I want your book. Excuse me for calling you brother, but you are. CASTANA, IA.

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: Inclosed is $5 for which please enroll me as a member of the coming Congress and a subscriber to your book. I am old and cannot see the great gathering, but I have enjoyed your beautiful descriptions of the Fair. I have been a Radical for forty years. I feel like leaving my name on the record of your book. There are too many Radicals who go to church and give their mite there instead of supporting Radical papers and interests. Give against superstition all the strength of your mind and strike to kill.

Yours for truth, CARRIE BORDEN DAY.

The following is a full list of names. As fast as received the names will be published. Send them in as quickly as possible. There is no better way to advance Freethought.

After this week I shall be in Chicago and I would like to have friends send all communications to my address there—345 W. Randolph street. If more convenient for subscribers to remit directly to THE TRUTH SEEKER for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," I ask them to do so. Let there be no delay. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Why I Do Not Like the God and Religion of My Parents.—Continued.

Christians destroyed every work of art, every temple and fine building; burnt every library, and drove man back from a high civilization to barbarism, and for a thousand years the time was known as the "Dark Ages."

Infidelity rescued man and woman from the barbarity of Christianity. It is not two centuries since a holy council of the Catholic church was held, six hundred bishops presiding, to determine the important question "If a woman should be permitted to learn the alphabet." Of this six hundred bishops five hundred and ninety-four voted "No." They said, "It would unfit and disqualify her for her duties toward her husband." And they went further and declared "That a woman who would commit the multiplication table to memory was a fit subject for hell." Friend, what say you to this?

After Infidelity has forced them to respect woman, just listen to their holy howl in the pulpit: "Oh! dear sister, it is you who was first at the foot of the cross. It is you who should support this glorious religion. It is you whom the church has elevated from degradation and slavery, and lifted to your present proud position in society." Save me from a fool, liar, and hypocrite. But it is charity to suppose many of them ignorant. They know no better. Many of them have read nothing but Sunday-school tracts, or, perhaps, something from John Wesley or Baxter's "Call." I think if there is a God, a fool must worry him.

The wise man will investigate. Church history is all written in the interest of the church and to deceive the people. The Jewish Bible from Genesis to the book of Ezra was all furnished by Ezra and his expert scribes. All the power and authority given in the Mosaic law to the priesthood was put there by Ezra for his own aggrandizement. If there was such a person as Moses, he lived two thousand years before Ezra's time. And we only have Ezra's word for it that such a person as Moses ever lived. Josephus tells us, and so does Ezra, that when the Jews were taken into captivity every vestige of Jewish writings was destroyed. And Ezra proposed to the king of Babylon to reproduce these same writings burnt three hundred years before he was born, "provided the king would furnish him five expert scribes." Well, he undoubtedly obtained some very expert scribes. And by stealing some Chaldean writings as a base, Ezra soon possessed a history of his people made from whole cloth. I am not convinced that such a person as Moses ever lived. If there did, he was a Chaldean, no Jew. Yet this book is the holy word of God. "Giv us a rest."

The pious Christian reads the book with holy reverence, not knowing it to be but a Gulliver novel. He knows that the man "after God's own heart" wrote the blessed Psalms; and when he reads Ps. cxxxvii and finds it bewailing the Babylonian captivity he is too pious to know that King David had lain in his grave fully six hundred years before the Babylonian captivity.

Ezra, experts say, wrote the Psalms—not King David. The whole thing was got up by rascally priests to humbug and rule the human family, and they have ruled and cursed the world long enough. I am tired of their assumptions and shall try to protect me and mine from their vile machinations.

I am tired and disgusted with the audacity and dirty meanness of priestcraft, and their continued efforts, through their attempted union of church and state, to destroy the liberties of the people. It is the duty of everyone to do all they can to educate man in the defense of his rights. Priests have robbed him of one-seventh of his valuable time and would compel him to come and listen to their stories told over and over again millions of times and read at home millions of times. Yes, they would place a band around one's head and prevent his brain expanding; chain him upon the stool of superstition and keep him ignorant, so they could rule him; permit no literature but such as they recommend, and thus forever retard human progress. I think it every man's duty to do all he can for the liberty of man. I know if the church possessed the power they would burn me at the stake. Hence it is my duty to prevent them obtaining the power. This duty is to myself—not to God; for God claims nothing from me, but has left me, by nature's laws alone inspired, to eat when hungry, rest when tired. Self-preservation is my duty, hence I shall do what I can to destroy superstition, priestcraft, and the slavery of the human intellect to imaginary gods and devils. There is a nature which creates and develops and teaches by evolution.

God did not learn me or you anything; we learned all we know from our surroundings. Circumstances made us all; circumstances were our only teacher. God has no account against us for schooling. The greater variety of circumstances surrounding us, the greater was our teacher.

The Christian teaches to "order Satan behind you and press forward with faith." How can one possess faith in a thing he knows to be a lie and fraud from the beginning? I can't. Before I can possess any faith in the monster the Christians call God, they must make him over and alter many of his attributes. All gods are man-made, and I possess as much right to make a god as anyone, and should I find time to spare from some more useful occupation, I may try my hand and make a god to suit me. I shall ask no other mortal to worship him. I will not be like the Christian, and contend that my god is the only god, and all who do not believe in him. No! Freethought. Human advancement is impossible without Freethought. Christianity will not suffer the mind to know anything but Christ and him crucified.

"Behold the lilies of the valley, they toil not neither do they spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." "Take no thought," etc. No, you must lie down in filth and support yourself upon the slime and drippings of the filthy monster that has usurped your right to think and worked upon your fears through the preaching of a burning hell, malignant devil, and cruel, angry God, until you are afraid to think. I think it a crime to preach a devil, hell, or angry God. There is no angry God—no devil, no heaven, no hell, outside of your own bosom. If you pass through life with your desires gratified, this is heaven; if you stump your toe and miss a trick, this is hell. No angry God, no heaven or hell, no cunning devil but the priest. Look out for him; he wants your yellow-legged chickens, your wife, sister, or daughter; your property, your liberty, and to have you ever his willing slave.

I ask no one to go my way, or serve my God. If my God wants anything, I will make him large enough, strong enough, and smart enough to get it without anyone's assistance. I shall not make a God whose happiness shall demand the sacrifice of innocent blood. I will not make him to get angry and curse in his wrath whole nations of people and order their destruction—men, women, children, and dumb brutes.

When I go into the God business, I will make no sardine, but a God endowed with every virtue and possessed of no evil. He will not send the spirits of lying prophets to deceive and lead his people astray.

I do not fancy Israel's God. I have read and studied diligently all that the Jewish Bible said of him. I have read various commentaries upon the Bible, all comments upon God and his attributes as portrayed by his superstitious admirers. I spent years reading religious trash, and the more I read the more disgusted I became. Had I believed as my parents did, there could have been no advancement, no improvement, no investigation. But thought and investigation brought desire for change. I wanted a different god. Israel's God was too mean and cruel. I cannot permit ignorant pagans to make a God for me. My soul craved something better. I found it in the elements of nature, as matter, and electricity as force, where there is neither love, hatred, envy, anger, malice, nor revenge, but nature's laws all working in harmony with evolution, ever advancing man to a higher and better plane of existence.

Kingcraft and priestcraft have cursed the world so long that a large majority of the human family have become so superstitious that they are afraid to think. Hence these pretended vicegerents of God have been enabled to rule by sumptuary laws, the tyrant's wand.

Am I right? Or should I lay aside my manhood and reason and get down and pray and howl to some imaginary God, away up somewhere, pictured by some old fool pagan thousands of years ago? My friends, do not be afraid to investigate; God will not damn you for doubts, nor for investigating. This is your duty, and when you investigate as I have you will speedily have lifted from you a heavy load, the great burden of life—superstition. No doubt, my friend, but you have investigated by reading all the church literature you could get your hands upon. But this is not investigation. It is but placing a mask between yourself and truth. Now read everything you can find upon the other side—Paine's works, Volney, Voltaire, Spencer, Darwin, Ingersoll, the Truth Seeker Library, and take THE TRUTH SEEKER, published at 28 Lafayette place, New York, and read it the balance of your life, as an alloy to your religious reading. At the same time you can read carefully the Bible, hunt up its 144 flat contradictions, and look up its 2,000 errors; read and reflect, and then ask yourself if God had any hand in such stuff. It is all the machinations of man—and rascals at that—engaged in hoodwinking, fooling, humbugging, and enslaving the minds of their fellow-man; murdering, burning, pilfering, robbing—all in the name of God. The whole thing is a lie from Genesis to Revelation, all a fraud and a curse to mankind.

Investigate. No god will damn you for investigating, and when you have thoroughly investigated you will feel greatly relieved. You will feel like a new man, light-hearted and happy. The dread of a burning hell will disappear. The frowning face of an angry God will no longer disturb you; you will feel in truth a free man, with none to make afraid. Come with me, lift yourself from the old ruts of

I am thankful that I was enabled to think there remains not sophistry or cunning sufficient to turn me one inch from and smooth paths of nature. I am a naturalist—that which is natural cannot be a sin.

But Christianity teaches "to crucify nature." Shame—what fools! Their God gave man a nature, then made it the duty of his life to fight that nature.

I take no stock in such a God nor in his religion. He doesn't suit me. I cannot consent to claim any such God as being the true God. I make no sacrifice to superstition, ignorance, credulity, nor cunningly devised fables of heathens or pagans. Man is continually advancing, and will so long as he possesses liberty and Freethought. And those who come after us will know more than we do. Man has advanced from animalculæ of the sea to what he is, and will continue to advance until he will be enabled to grasp the helm of nature and direct her laws to his own purposes.

I have investigated all gods from earliest history, and I find them all man-made, and all requiring a sacrifice of some kind. This sacrifice was for the priest. Yes, he must live, and he always obtained God's portion. And at one haul we are assured that, with other spoils, he obtained thirty thousand virgins. Pretty good allowance for the saintly cuss, you must admit. But then the Lord wanted the virgins, for the priest said so. Oh, in the language of Puck, "What fools these mortals be!" Must swallow the whole thing and stand trembling for fear an angry God will knock us out and damn us to everlasting torment if we even think! We can only with a sad face mentally declare, "Great are the mysteries of God and his holy priesthood."

They first baptized with fire, then blood, and now with water. I admit the water is an improvement if used vigorously with soap, for many of them need it. One man was made a saint in the Christian church because he had not washed his feet in fifty years; another, because he had never washed any part of his body, and a woman was sainted because she had never washed but the tip ends of her fingers. And yet another man was sainted because he had dwelt seven years in an old well, and yet another because he had slept standing for nine years in a thicket of thorns. What a dirty set of saints! I could give you a long list of them, but the subject is too dirty. The early Christian refused to wash the food he ate, dressed in rags, and dwelt in filth indescribable. They refused to live in good houses—they must do nothing that the worldling did. They were required to come out from human nature and become dirty brutes. Infidelity taught them a little decency. Now they possess audacity sufficient to claim every virtue as peculiarly Christian, and they can use and they can say "Christian gentleman" with all the grace and suavity of a Chesterfield. Well, I am glad to see them change and improve; but with all their improvement there yet dwells with them the persecuting principle that would burn at the stake all Infidels if they could but obtain the power to do so. This is the greatest objection to religions of all kinds, the disposition it gives them to persecute everyone who does not agree with them. Even the Mohammedan can say "Infidel dog" with as much vindictiveness as the Christian.

Any religion or principle that causes man to persecute his fellow-man is not from any god. No religion has ever started that did not prove to be a curse; and never will, until they make a god capable of taking care of himself, and one that talks directly to the people, not through dark holes in a mysterious language to priests. But certainly, my friend, so far as you and I are concerned, there is no God. There is a nature, and we are all subject to that nature, and we are subject to nothing else. We cannot violate any law of nature without punishment. This anyone of ordinary intelligence must know. And this punishment is in this world, not the next. Hence there can be no sin but sin against nature.

You can sin against your fellow-man, but not against God. There is no God who will punish you in the next world for what you do in this. In fact, there is no next world to suffer in. For when you are dead, you are dead. "The dead go down to the grave and have no more a reward forever."

So shake off your superstitious fears and tread the earth with the might of all your manhood. For there is no burning hell to fall into, and when a priest tells you there is, give him the kick he deserves. Man is subject to nature's laws and is governed and controlled by the circumstances that surround him. He always acts as he thinks at the time "for the best." And as the most powerful motive governs and controls his acts, he could not act otherwise than he does, unless circumstances change, or he does violence to his nature, hence the only remedy for crime is to cultivate and improve the perceptive faculties by education, and thus enable man to control as far as possible his surroundings. Poverty is one among the greatest curses and drawbacks to human progress, as it surrounds the individual with unfavorable and uncontrollable circumstances, influencing him often against his will and judgment. And then the church has ever sided with wealth and power, authority and influence, against the poor and helpless, so she could rule them. And the church has ever prayed to God for the rich. "The poor could beg."

Yet poverty is not wholly an evil, as it has furnished "Necessity the mother of invention."

And when we investigate the pro's and con's, and institute a scientific investigation of life and the various effects upon us, for our weal and woe, of all things in nature, we are often led to think that "whatever is, is right." W. B. RADFORD, M.D.

(TO BE CONCLUDED.)

Caste Legislation.

"Truth seeker" is a good name for a paper or for an individual who is in search of truth, but the question arises, are all who call themselves truth seekers sincere and honest? Are they in search of truth? Truth is eternal and bows at no human shrine. If mankind were in earnest and actually coveted truth, there would not be a financial cyclone desolating the commerce of our fair land to-day. Why this fearful cry of "hard times?" What is the cause? Where does it lie? Who is to blame? From whence this wanton destruction of our peace and happiness? One sentence answers all: Caste legislation.

A combination of states have no right against the product of another state more than a legislature has to exclude one of its citizens from those liberties vouchsafed to her or him by the immortal Declaration of American Independence. That law which gives rights to the few as against the many is not law but knavery, deceit, and damnable hypocrisy. Not one word or sentence can be cited in or from that Declaration that permits the passing of or enacting a law whereby one American can be ostracized or debarred from making an honest living through and by the use of those faculties with which nature has provided her or him. I say that caste legislation is the demon of evil that is to-day riding down the bone, sinew, and brains of this republic, and making slaves of every daughter and son of toil. The Declaration is the stone upon which this republic was and is built, and by it we stand or fall. By virtue of that document and upon it was and is our Constitution erected. Every law must (to be law) conform to and be acceptable to that Constitution, and that Constitution can only exist and be perpetuated by carrying out every principle of that grandest of all documents that has ever existed. It is as far ahead of the law that Moses received from his God as is the great World's Exposition now being held at Chicago ahead of a Spanish Christian bull-fight.

It is not law that curtails one American from enjoying perfect freedom to pursue those avocations which by nature she or he is best qualified to pursue. It does not take a person with seven eyes to see where the tyrant lies couched. We find him in every city and village in the Union, and shame to our boasted patriotism. He is of the masculine gender, every time.

Lynx-eyed, hyena-streaked, ecclesiastical priestcraft; dogmatic practitioners of medicine, and political lawyers—those are the triple brothers that thwart justice, blaspheme our flag, and make it a lie; sustain the lobby, support and uphold aristocracy, kingcraft, and all the barbarisms, superstitions, and fabulous nonsense of the black, bleak, arrant, and licentious demonism of the Middle Ages. Those three evils are the tripod upon which tyranny sits enthroned and mocks the doings of the fathers of the nation, driving their descendants into a Siberian slavery, and defaming the Goddess of Liberty, freedom, and justice, and loading her with the infamous chains of serfdom and animalism.

Strike from the false statute-books every privileged act that permits brainless scullions to ply their titled and bought franchises, and give every daughter and son of this fair land the right that is theirs, and let freedom rejoice where merit is the criterion of preferment and she or he culls the flowers of reward because of their genius and ability.

Liberty does not mean license for the few or many, but justice to and for all.

The autocrat will soon pass away when once his henchmen are deprived of caste and privileged legislation. Ignorance will be supplanted by knowledge, and dogma and creed, with titled aristocracy, will be closeted in the dungeons and hells of the terrible past. Benjamin Franklin was not a favorite of ecclesiasticism—neither possessed a hoodoo of a diploma or certificate of privileged law to practice medical tyranny, legal chicanery, or ecclesiastical nonsense; and yet he has done more for the toiling millions than all of those tricksters in Christendom combined. The animalism of the world has run to seed, the harvest is immense, and let me tell you, the gathering and threshing will be fearful. Justice demands that an equilibrium be established, and that demand must be complied with. It matters not if the very mountains be loosened from their foundation, liberty must be established and right proclaim the freedom of all. It is in the nature of things an inevitable law. The adoption of policy instead of principle has entailed untold misery upon the masses. The end is not yet; it has only begun. A little while longer and the breach will have widened into a gulf. Then will come the storm and in its wake pestilence, disasters, cyclones, earthquakes, and horrors in ratio to the demands of violated eternal law and order.

G. H. MILLER.

International Congress of Freethinkers.

Sabbatarianism and fanaticism have triumphed over liberty and justice. They have at last succeeded in their pernicious attempts to restrain the freedom of this republic. Right and truth have been ruthlessly cast aside, and bigotry has planted its standard upon the fortress of faith. The World's Fair is to be closed on Sunday. Following immediately upon the decision of Chief-justice Fuller, the preachers with their flocks of ignorant followers formed combinations among themselves and sought out other avenues wherein they could concentrate their efforts to get it closed again. Beaten out of equity, the law of the land being denied against them by the highest judicial authority, they now turned their efforts toward the individual exhibitors, and tried by every means in their power to induce these to close up their exhibits on Sunday. Many of these exhibitors, being tainted by orthodoxy themselves, readily complied with their demands, and not only did they veil their exhibits on the first day of the week, but also displayed a card in a conspicuous place bearing the ominous sign, "Closed on Sunday." This card was furnished to them by the church, and was hung up throughout the entire week. The people seeing this, learned that scarce anything worth seeing would be opened to them on Sunday, and consequently refused to go. By this the rich people, or those who had sufficient time at their disposal to go on a week-day, could see the whole Fair for the fifty-cent admission; while the workmen of Chicago, who could only go on Sunday, could see but very little for the same price. The purpose of the clergy was to make Sunday as unpopular as possible. They urged their flocks to keep away on Sunday, and tried by every means in their power to cause a diminished attendance on that day, thus giving to themselves an opportunity to inform the directors that there had never been any great demand for Sunday opening, and upon these grounds urge its immediate closing up. Owing to the opposition of the clergy to Sunday opening, several of the state buildings were closed. One by one the exhibitors who had opened at first fell in the general line, and even the Government Building itself came under their censorship. As a natural result the greater portion of those visiting the Fair preferred to go on a week-day, when more could be seen and the entire grounds should be opened without restriction or limitation. Had the Fair been fully opened on that day, had the machinery been allowed to run so that engineers of all descriptions could have listened to the song of its wheels and the poetry of its motion, had all the buildings been thrown wide open, Sunday would have been the most popular day of the week; the attendance would have been as large as, if not larger than, that of any other day, except perhaps special days or a national holiday. But bigotry has triumphed for the time. This victory will lead them and encourage them in the search for greater ones. Like the dog in the manger, the orthodox cranks did not wish to visit the Fair themselves on Sunday, and they spared no effort to try and prevent those from going who did. And why? Because they said, "This is the Lord's day, and you have no right to it." But my cry unto them is, Hypocrisy and humbug; if any day is the Lord's day all days are equally his, and consequently must be equally sacred. But in this recent aggressive action of the church, Freethinkers may find a lesson to take to heart and seriously reflect upon. Step by step bigots are encroaching upon the rights and feelings of the American people; they are playing a desperate game for political supremacy, and we must be fully prepared to meet every emergency. The terrible influence of orthodoxy has by no means lost its hold upon the people. Without active and increasing opposition to their steady advance we shall soon find ourselves hurled backward into the midnight of barbarism, tyrannized over by a cruel and relentless fiend, a monster in the form of a creed, and then will fall upon us with redoubled fury the system of the long-drawn Christian ages. The whitened sepulchers of the church will fasten themselves leech-like upon the intellect of the race; they will permeate our national life with their traditional parasitism; our constitutional rights and liberties will be utterly destroyed, and all the holy horrors of church rule will overtake us again. There is more need now than ever for the successful termination of this Congress. Our friends must stand by us, for the hour of need is at hand. Freethinkers everywhere, join hands with the noble army of Freethought and take your places in liberty's vanguard. The struggle for the very liberty we possess to-day has been a long and bitter one. It has lasted for centuries; the trials and tribulations endured by those who engaged in its cause should make that liberty sacred to us everywhere, and we must learn to guard it with jealous care. Though beaten for a time we must never relinquish the fight; but by our earnestness try to convey our enthusiasm to others, to fill them with our hopes, and by joining our aspirations with theirs we may together accomplish that which singly we would fail to win. How much, then, do we need the help of our friends to aid us in this fight; how willingly each one should give of whatever he may possess to place us in a position whereby we may give battle for the right! These are the salient points we must henceforth assume, and more particularly must we emphasize them at the Congress. From that meeting let a new battle-cry ring out, "For the right!" Let us set forth a new declaration of independence, of independence from church rule and priestly tyranny. The beauties of nature and the truths of science must be arrayed against the dogmas of the church and faith. A continuous warfare must be made against the professors of superstition and the paid mystery-mongers of the Christian faith. Let this Congress be the inauguration of the consolidation of our party. Let each one do his or her part, and the labor of others will not need to be so weary or so prolonged. It only requires a determined effort upon our part. We have the right material; the only question is "How shall we dispose of it?" Friends, send in your names and contributions to this Congress. It must be a success, but it remains for you to say, and by your actions to determine, whether it shall be so or not. In eight weeks the Congress will meet. We have not yet sufficient means at our disposal to guarantee its success. Each one should contribute to the fullest extent of his ability. The Congress is fast becoming popular among Freethinkers, as the following letter from our esteemed friend and co-worker will show:

July 11, 1893.

MY DEAR CHARLESWORTH: Your favor has been received. You ask me if I can attend the Congress and deliver an address. Most assuredly I shall attend the Congress . . . and will give a talk. Everywhere the Freethinkers are talking about the Congress, and I believe we can make it a grand success.

Fraternally yours,

J. E. REMSBURG.

Mr. Remsburg was in the lecture field at the time of writing the above. He was among the people of our cause, and was in a position to learn their sentiments upon the subject. We want the Freethinkers to talk about it, and by so doing they will advertise it. Spread the glad tidings all around, far and wide, on every hand, and wherever you find it possible send us in a subscription. Try to raise one among your friends and acquaintances. Remember that every little helps.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Sec. Committee of Arrangements.

My New England Trip.

It was quite a pleasant change from the rush and roar of Chicago to the bright quiet June days of New England. This is the season of the year when this land is particularly lovely, and indeed cannot be surpassed anywhere on the globe. For a month or more I have been reveling in the beauty of sea and shore, the luscious green fields, the wooded mountains, the tumbling rivers and cataracts, the multitude of ferns and flowers, and the changing skies, that clouds only make more delightful.

I strike Bristol, Conn., first, where C. F. Michaels generously opens his Opera House for the Secular pilgrim, but I do not find a very large attendance. The clergy keep at a safe distance, although as soon as I go away they begin to attack me vivaciously and viciously. However, I had a good report of the lecture in the newspapers, and I guess that will do some missionary work. There are a few Freethinkers at Bristol who have the courage of their conviction, and it was a privilege to meet with these. Mr. Michaels always gives a warm welcome, and does his level best for an unpopular cause. Perhaps some day we shall be in the swim. But whether or no we shall push ahead.

I come to Worcester, the heart of the commonwealth, and find a quite numerous audience here. Mr. W. B. Clark and others are a pretty stalwart company, and they propose to stand by the colors. There is a pretty good Liberal element in Worcester if it can only be rallied. I think it will, and make a big impression before winter appears.

I travel on to Boston, where I look into the Investigator office, and find this end of the line is in good order. I meet my Anarchist friends, Shumm and Walker, etc., who are not very terrible fellows after all, and wouldn't make a bad world if they had their own way.

Cape Cod is again in the way of my journeying, and Cape Cod is simply a paradise. No wonder they build elegant dwellings here, and the president spends leisure here, for surely this is as beautiful as the Italian shores themselves. The sea spreads away, and in soft blue light melts into the distant horizon. Cool breezes fan the cheek; the nights are delicious, with starry expanses, cool shadows, murmuring waters, and glittering sands.

I have a somewhat larger audience than before at Harwich, and I feel that some day the tide will turn for Freethought. Sunday afternoon, June 11th, B. F. Robbins drives me over to East Dennis, where I lecture afternoon and evening. The Liberal Society has been established here for over twenty years. Joshua Crowell is president, and ably carries on the work. I am entertained at his hospitable home. The hall in which I lecture is named Worden Hall, after Peter Worden, about the first settler on Cape Cod in 1639, who was "excepted to" on the church records. So it seems that he was theologically unsound, and as far as I can find out the first heretic on the continent. Cape Cod has always been the freest portion of Massachusetts. Somehow the mind was not quite so tied up here as at Boston and Plymouth. There was a good deal of adventurous life in this country, and the shining sea on both sides, and the broad outlooks, had a tendency to open the mind, and loosen the bonds of the old faith, and hence it was natural that even as far back as 1639 there should be some Freethought here. East Dennis maintains the tradition and carries on the work of progress. Although Mr. Crowell is an avowed Liberal, he has been elected several times to the general court of Massachusetts, and has occupied other official positions. So it seems that the church rule is not very rigid in these parts, although the other day the session of the justice's court was delayed about an hour in order to find a clergyman to open it with prayer. It is difficult for these old customs to disappear.

Monday, June 13th, I come over to Osterville, where I meet again the Crosbys and Captain Handy and other Liberals, and give two lectures to fair audiences. I have a fine sail Tuesday over the waters from Osterville to Cotuit. Delightful prospects open as the wind bears you lazily on. The weather is all that one could wish. Even if an occasional shower does come up and vary the scene, it passes and the sun shines out again with renewed brilliancy.

After taking in the varied scenes of Cape Cod and Boston, I journey again to the land of the Aroostook. I anticipated a debate with the Rev. Mr. Wheeler at Faneuil Hall, but for some reason or other he failed to make connection. I was in hopes that he or some other defender of the faith would put in an appearance. At Fort Fairfield President Baker issued a challenge to all the clergymen of Aroostook county, but not one ventured to debate.

However, the Liberal forces are gathering auspiciously at Fort Fairfield. Mr. Baker has a new bell on Liberty Hall, and it makes better music than all the church bells put together. I remained a month, and gave two lectures a Sunday, and the attendance was good. The membership of the League was increased greatly. There are about fifty now on the roll.

In connection with my work at Fort Fairfield I gave lectures in various parts of the county—in Caribou, Blaine, and Easton. Houlton, the county-seat, used to be quite a rallying-place for Liberals, but at present it is pretty difficult to stir them up. There is the rot of indifference. This is the great trouble in New England. The Freethinkers simply do nothing, either through cowardice or lack of interest. The majority of the people in Aroostook are Liberals, but they will not many of them be identified with any public movement. They don't care to make an issue. Next to Fort Fairfield I found that Blaine was the best point for lectures. This is about twenty miles from Fort Fairfield, and there are some live men here, who are willing to stand at the front. At Easton I lectured on Saturday afternoon, and we arranged to have a picnic in connection with the occasion. Only a few were in from the immediate vicinity, but with the forces we brought from Fort Fairfield and round about, we made quite a goodly show. It was asserted that at Easton, over the line, there were two grog-shops, and they didn't want anything worse than these in the shape of a Freethought meeting. It seemed to be a good plan to meet this accusation by a demonstration of what a Freethought meeting was, and by a declaration of our principles, and the movement was a success.

I was assisted in the campaign by Mrs. John Avery, Mrs. C. M. Waldron, Nettie C. Avery (who sang the Freethought melodies), and Miss Lizzie F. Waldron, who gave a recitation. It is fortunate that we have the ladies to aid us in this way, and show that Freethought is for woman as well as man; and for the graces and amenities of human life, even if we do have to engage in pioneer work.

I enjoyed with John McGill a pleasant drive over the line to Perth, where Geo. E. Baxter lives, and who is going to lecture occasionally for the League during the coming season. He is an ardent Freethinker, and of great help to us in the work here. There is quite a sprinkling of Liberals over the line in New Brunswick.

I also enjoyed a visit to Joseph A. Conant's, and climbed the highest hill near Fort Fairfield, which gave me a grand and lovely view of the country for many miles—Presque Isle, Caribou, the far-off Katahdin, and Mars Hill, which looms up majestically over the village of Blaine. Aroostook county in the perfection of its glory now; the farm looking splendidly, the crops are in fine condition, and there is a picture of prosperity in every direction. The hard times have not come here yet.

The Conants are a big family, and make almost a whole regiment for our cause—and a family meeting would make quite an audience of Freethinkers. There are Joseph A. Conant, Sr. and Jr.; Stephen R. Conant, Isaac Conant, Chas. M. Waldron, and their families—all with us. Among the others are Mr. and Mrs. Frank Grant, in whose home I also found entertainment; Frank Hanson, Geo. L. McNally, Wilnot A. Hiscock, the Ackorn brothers, W. T. Ashley, A. G. Rollins, O. A. Johnson, Benj. Whitehouse, Henry H. Gilman, John A. Davis, A. W. Hatfield, J. L. Parks, George Eastman, the Averys, etc. I cannot mention all, but my friend Baker has an array of supporters of which anyone might be proud; and with Liberty Hall for a rallying-place, I am sure there will be continual progress.

I wish there was somebody like R. L. Baker in every town in Aroostook. I feel sure that we might do a rushing business for Freethought. The elements are present, but it needs some one with persistent genius to bring them together and organize. I have great hopes of the Fort Fairfield League. It is far away from the main lines of travel, and it cannot depend upon the cooperation of other societies throughout the land. It may be, however, that some of our lecturers will be able to go there on a kind of vacation tour as I did, and combine pleasure and work. Aroostook is a good place for summer residence. There are fine prospects, excellent fishing and hunting grounds, etc. I met one man at Blaine who had just brought in his ninety-third bear. He intends to kill a hundred before he dies. Those who like bear can have a chance in the forests of Aroostook.

Even the Christians of Aroostook as a general thing are a jolly set. There are a few bigoted ones, but on the whole I found them quite genial. They wouldn't come to my lectures, but in a social way they treated me first-rate.

I couldn't find a better place than the comfortable surroundings, brilliant landscapes, and happy society of Fort Fairfield in which to begin my wanderings in the "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I was enabled in the quietude and leisure of this remote post to make a beginning in this vast field, and there was not a dull moment, combining the glories of the past with the labors of the present. It was one of the pleasantest experiences of my life, and I must thank the Liberals of Fort Fairfield for their generous treatment, and we can all look forward to the future with hope.

I left Fort Fairfield on Monday, July 17th, and coming to Bangor by car took the boat on Tuesday down the Penobscot to Bar Harbor, and from Bar Harbor I take the boat to Rockland, and thence to Boston, and if I had time I should like to describe this really enchanting journey. The most changeable and attractive views of land and sea were constantly opening before one, and you scarcely felt like sleeping, both day and night being so full of glittering panoramas.

On my arrival in Boston I had the pleasure of spending an evening with Washburn, in his beautiful home at Revere, where the beach, crowded with hundreds of people, stretches away, and bands of music are playing and summer's revelry makes beauty on every hand.

I also make a call at the home of the Dentons at Wellesley. This is a lovely place, and there is plenty of stimulation for heart and head, for here are the people who think and work for humanity. Here also is art, the study of nature, especially the fishes of the sea. I wish I could describe all these glowing forms and colors. Mrs. Elizabeth Denton is still interested as ever in progress and reform with bright and indomitable spirit. In the evening Mrs. Shull makes up a party for a drive around Wellesley, Natick, etc., and certainly one could not find more elegance and splendor than is witnessed in these prosperous suburbs of Boston. Mrs. Shull is an exhilarating reformer, and it did me good to meet with one so thoroughly radical, and so earnest for the elevation of humanity.

I stop over Sunday at Meriden, Conn. It is one of the most beautiful days of the whole season, and Meriden shone effulgent in the bright atmosphere. I was at the charming home of Mr. and Mrs. N. F. Griswold, and we read and talked, and in the afternoon drove about the country, and this was indeed a vivifying conclusion for my New England trip.

I have been so busy writing up "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," and "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," that I have not had time to give more than this fragmentary description of my last month's work. I now return to Chicago, and shall harness for the coming International Fair, and I am sure it is to be a great success. I encourage us. The Christians have only shown their chicanery and meanness. They have not conquered the Fair itself nor the people of Chicago. The churches will remain just as empty as they ever were.

Now let us all join forces for a grand Congress. Let us make a fitting close to the vast and splendid triumphs of four hundred years of Freethought. I expect to shake hands with a thousand Liberals in this auspicious time. SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The Christian Scheme of Salvation.

Theologians call this scheme the "atonement." It is an ecclesiastical device to degrade the nature of man and to glorify the mercy and loving kindness of God. Thousands are deceived by it, and the moral culture of the race is retarded by the lying theory which says "there is no health in us." Once impress upon men the idea that they are sick, and unless they have sufficient will-power to successfully combat the error they are sure to feel indisposed and stay home; so in like manner if men hear nothing but statements of their inherent wickedness, that they "are born in sin" and "shaped in iniquity," they are sure to continue in their sins, to excuse their crimes, and to look elsewhere for that moral stamina which should be the natural result of the development of their own faculties.

The ordinary Christian is very ignorant of the origin and character of many of the leading tenets of his church. When it is asked, "Why are Liberals always hammering at the Bible, the church, creeds, and dogmas?" the answer is, "Because the truth about these things is not told by those who preach them and profit by their propagation." Theology is a system of mystification. Priests use language to conceal their thoughts, and the people become slaves of cunning phrases. Few believers have investigated the theory of the "atonement," but every Christian can talk glibly about such preposterous side-issues as "circumcision," "fulfillment of the law," "baptism," "grace," "justification by faith," "imputed righteousness," "second coming of Christ," "election," "predestination," etc. All these theological figments tend to obscure the brutal and bloodthirsty features of the "atonement" from the minds of men and women.

The "four gospels" certainly do not teach this doctrine in the form presented by recognized church authorities, and those isolated passages which are quoted as evidence are pressed into the theological service by a forced and strained interpretation. The writers of the "epistles" are the "chief of sinners" in respect to the suggestion of this doctrine, and the "church" through its "fathers" and councils is responsible for its present form. It is an egregious error to believe that Christian theology has always been what it is to-day. Every doctrine has its history, and some of the doctrines were centuries in process of formation. This very doctrine now under consideration is an illustration of the fact. The writer of the "epistle" to the Romans says (v, 10-12): "For if when we were enemies we were reconciled to God by the death of his son, much more being reconciled we shall be saved by his life. And not only so, but we also joy in God through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the atonement. Wherefore as by one man sin entered into the world and death by sin, and so death passed upon all men for that all have sinned."

This clearly means that in consequence of one man's (Adam) sin, humanity was separated from God, or rather that God was offended, and that the physical torture and death of Christ reconciled these two enemies—God and humanity. The early church fathers dwell with considerable devotion upon those passages which represent the suffering and great sacrifice of Christ, but during the first four centuries there appeared no certainty of opinion as to whether they were a ransom-price paid to God or to the devil. Origen and St. Augustine supposed that the ransom-price was paid to the devil. Athanasius controverted this theory and maintained that the ransom was paid to God. It was not, however, until the middle of the eleventh century that the doctrine was arranged into something like theological consistency. Anselm was the man who accomplished this marvelous dialectical feat. Like every other church dogma it is a confusing mosaic of assumptions. It may be summarized as follows: The infinit guilt which man had contracted by his disobedience of God's laws could be satisfied (or atoned for) by no mere creature; only the God-man J. C. could render the required satisfaction. God only can satisfy himself. The human nature of Christ enabled him to incur the debt (or take up the note) and his divine nature enabled him to pay it. As a human being it was incumbent upon him to order his life according to the law of God; but as a God he was under no obligation to die. But he nevertheless voluntarily surrendered his life and was therefore entitled to a recompense. This recompense consisted in the forgiveness of the sins of those who accepted the terms of the compact.

Slight modifications have been made of this theory by Luther, Calvin, and a host of other Christian apologists, but in its main features it may be taken as the "Christian scheme of salvation."

Now the fundamental principles here stated are gratuitous assumptions.

First. Man's sin of disobedience was of infinite demerit.

Second. Christ had a double nature—human and divine.

Third. Sin is transferable.

Assuming that there was on the part of man an act of disobedience, how can it be regarded as of infinit proportions? A finite being cannot commit an infinit crime. A lie is a lie whether it be told to a prince or a pauper, and the person to whom it is told does not lessen or increase its dimensions. A crime is not greater than the criminal. But this act of disobedience was not committed by the whole human race, but by one man—Adam. (See above quotation from Romans.) This raises the question, Is not sin (or wrong-doing) of a personal character? A man may commit a burglary, or any other form of social violence, but that would not make his children burglars; and to punish his children for the misdeeds of the parent would be an act of injustice and of cruelty.

S. T. Coleridge defines sin "as an evil which has its ground or origin in the agent, and not in the compulsion of circumstances. An act to be sin must be original, and a state or act that has not its origin in the will may be a calamity, deformity, or disease, but sin it cannot be." The sin of Adam then is not the sin of the human race. But did Adam sin? Or was there a sin at all? Sir William Jones in his "Asiatic Researches" says, "Either the first eleven chapters of Genesis are true or the whole fabric of our national religion is false." In other words, if Adam did not sin precisely in the manner set forth in the book of Genesis, then the crucifixion, resurrection, and ascension of Christ are myths. No "fall," no "resurrection," no apple, no harp, no garden of Eden, no mansions in the sky.

It is impossible to believe that a scheme of such gigantic proportions—involving as it does the nature and character of God, the nature and destiny of the human race—should have been revealed to man by an almighty-wise God in such an incomplete and suspicious manner! No theologian with a reputation to lose would defend the biblical version of man's origin.

Keeping, however, to the ethical phase of the question, Did Adam sin? Did the act of disobedience originate with him or was he the creature of circumstances? God is perfect, say the theologians. He is all-wise, all-powerful, all-good. He is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. God knows everything. With him there is no yesterday, no to-morrow. Everything is. The immeasurable past and the illimitable future are present facts. He has no need of a memory, and imagination is quite unnecessary. If this be true now, it was true before Adam was born. The sin of Adam was a fact to God millions of years before it was committed; and furthermore, the sacrifice of Christ was a fact (accomplished) to God before Adam sinned. Adam and Christ were but two characters in a drama which had been, and still is, in the mind of God throughout eternity.

God was not surprised at Adam's fall. He made him to fall because it was also arranged that Christ should be the means of restoring him to his original innocence and purity. In fact, Christ died (in God's mind) before Adam sinned.

Can it be said, then, that Adam sinned? Certainly not.

If God be all-powerful he could have made man impervious to sin and temptation; yea, he ought to have surrounded him with every safeguard, knowing as he did that the devil was on the watch to destroy his most perfect handiwork. God did not so make him, so he is responsible for all the suffering, misery, and crime entailed upon the human race as a consequence of the corruption and imperfection of their original progenitor.

If God be all-good and all-wise, as well as all-powerful, he would have destroyed the procreative faculties of Adam and made a new man on an improved plan. And if he found it impossible to perpetuate a pure and perfect race, he ought to have abandoned the idea altogether; for it would be more merciful to abstain from creating a race than to create one which is in danger of an everlasting hell.

The theory of the double nature of Christ is a necessary counterpart of this general theory of salvation. It is an ingenious and subtle contrivance, and at the same time has many comical aspects. When examined in connection with the "atonement," it appears very inconsistent and absurd.

The sin of Adam was of infinit proportions, still the human half of Christ was created so that he might assume the guilt; for God could not participate in sin. The divine half of Christ undertook to offer itself as a sacrifice—in the form of death—for that guilt; still it must be remembered that the divine can neither suffer nor die. How then, in the name of all that's true and good, could the man-Christ assume an infinit load of sin, and how could the God-Christ offer a sacrifice by death when God cannot die? If Christ were God then he could not die, and if he were man only he had not the divine merits necessary to satisfy outraged deity. The subject becomes much more complicated when it is remembered that it is God who is supposed to be making all this fuss. The man-Christ evidently thought he was doing all the suffering, for it is reported that he exclaimed at the close of the great drama, "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?"

The injury done to mankind by the teaching of this doctrine is incalculable. Men have been taught to ask God for forgiveness of sins through the atoning merits of Jesus Christ, and as they have never received an answer whether their sins have been forgiven or not, they have taken the priest's answer instead. The priest is full of ready compliance, he will always promise to forgive. It costs him nothing and the ignorant victim is ready to subject himself to priestly power and authority in return.

Sins cannot be forgiven but by those sinned against. Man injures his fellows; he should make reparation to them. God has nothing to do with it. He stands alone, distinct and absolute. He cannot be related to the affairs of men and the world, and to accept his imaginary forgiveness while the injured one still suffers is an act of cowardice and brutality.

The same may be said of the doctrine of "imputed righteousness," or the taking on of the righteousness of Christ. This is a favorite theory of Calvinist and Methodist alike. It is born of that lying dogma which says "All are born in sin and shapened in iniquity." Having no goodness of their own they borrow Christ's and fancy themselves strutting about in the borrowed plumage of the son of God.

Goodness cannot be bought nor borrowed. It is natural to man, and it increases in proportion as he learns his true relationship to his fellow-man, and "seeks to find his own in all men's good."

It is time that men recognized the fact that salvation does not consist of gaining heaven nor shunning hell, but rather in self-improvement.

That man is "saved" whose mind is broad, sympathetic, and clear; whose physical functions are vigorous and healthy as a result of pure and wholesome food, and wise and chaste living; and whose ideal is to help spread the knowledge of right, and to see virtue and happiness prevail.

Random Notes.

Moses was the most meek man who had ever lived during and prior to the time he was on the earth, and the terrible state of society can be definitely arrived at when we consider without prejudice some of the deliberate, cold-blooded murders and crimes which he committed against humanity. He commenced operations quite early in life by killing an Egyptian with a club, and followed it up by assisting at the massacre of all the first-born, the drowning of Pharo's hosts, the killing of his own people by the bite of fiery serpents, and later by the massacre of whole cities of innocent, harmless, and unsuspecting peoples, with the exception of the maidens, whom he reserved for purposes which we would be ashamed to publish and offer for carriage through the United States mails under a Democratic administration.

It seems as though ninety and nine of the Presbyterian synod have gone astray, leaving only one old buck in the fold to freeze to death alone.

Samson was very strong in body, but he was no match for his wife when it came to headwork.

One of the marked improvements in society since Abel's sudden taking off is, that a sheep-herder is not considered any more honorable than an honest farmer on account of his associations.

During the war in heaven the angelic cavalry made their famous charge astride of winged horses (Doré's illustrations in "Paradise Lost"), but nowadays God depends for spiritual protection upon the tumult of those jackasses who can bray the longest and loudest, and longest without giving other people a chance to speak.

The last time God has been seen was when the Apostles were celebrating the last supper with wine made principally of water.

Prayers for rain will not be heard during the coming dry season.

A late scientist, who has been sojourning in the lower regions, has recently discovered the "great fixed gulf" which has so long separated the two future localities to be ice instead of glass. His reasons for the final entire disappearance of the aforesaid gulf and the already perceptible cooling of lower levels will be easily understood.

My mother's religion is not good enough for me if I can make it better.

There are plenty of people in the world narrow enough to love God because they believe he is mean enough to burn up some of their neighbors.

People would still be going around naked if the devil had not laughed at Eve.

The devil is said to have been, and still to be, a champion of new ideas and fashions. If so, let him "go about and roar" while he devours the new crinoline.

If Mary was a virgin when she married Joseph the world is not growing wicked with so great rapidity as the People's party platform would have us believe.

Some people think twice before they speak, but there are twice as many who speak twice before they think at all.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG has just closed a midsummer campaign in Iowa, delivering thirty-seven lectures in thirty days.

THE LADIES' Liberal League of Philadelphia holds meetings regularly every Tuesday evening at 8 p.m. Admission free. All welcome.—M. P. McLeod, Sec.

CHARLES WATTS will be in Toronto about September 1st, and will lecture on his way from there to Chicago, which city he will reach about October 1st, to attend the International Congress of Freethinkers. We have received no word from his colleague, Mr. Foote. Mr. Watts's friends can address him care Secular Thought, Toronto, Ont.

Letters of Friends.

The Best.

DUNOANNON, PA., July 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed renewal of my subscription, for I cannot do without the paper. It is certainly the best paper of the kind ever published, in my estimation.

JASON PASSMORE.

Could Not Keep the Charlatans Away When He Was Dead.

MILTON, PA., July 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The late Isaac Marsh departed this life Dec. 19, 1892. THE TRUTH SEEKER had been his Bible for many years, and he did very little else but read that paper. He did not want a preacher at his funeral, but as he died of paralysis in less than two hours, could say nothing on the subject, so the friends and G. A. R. buried him as everybody else is buried here.

MARY D. MARSH.

Is Pamphleteering the Authorities.

DAYTON, O., June 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: For the inclosed fifty cents please send at once to my address thirty World's Fair leaflets. I want them for distribution. The last order of one hundred and eight I received from you are all distributed to officials and prominent parties in Ohio and Indiana. I sent them mostly by mail so rapidly that I have not enough to supply all of the police of this city, which number fifty-seven.

Fraternally, NOAH COLER.

It Is the Enemy of Imposition and Fraud.

McKEESPORT, PA., July 21, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $3 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I could not afford to miss one issue. Heston's pictures alone are worth the subscription price. He is an artist, nay, a genius. Taking all in all, I consider your publication the best Liberal paper published on the continent.

Wishing you all possible success, and long life to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER, the avowed enemy of superstition, imposition, and fraud, I am hastily but cordially,

A. J. GILLIS.

He Proselytes Traveling Men.

CAPRON, ILL., July 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I am much pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER in every respect. The papers are kept in my office, where the public can have access to them. The traveling men especially take great interest in them, and many is the laugh created by Heston's genius or hearty applause given to the thought and words of some of the writers. There is a good Liberal element here. The "holy cloth" would talk to empty pews were it not for the women and children.

With best wishes for your own success and for the cause, I am, very truly,

C. E. HILLYER.

Ingersoll Set Him Thinking.

LAKEPORT, S. D., July 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $1.50, for which send the books entitled "The Creation of God" and "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated."

About three months ago I happened to read some of Colonel Ingersoll's works, which shook my faith in religion. They set me thinking, and the more I thought the more I became convinced of its utter emptiness, and now I am working hard for the cause of Freethought.

My brother takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is a most excellent paper.

Yours for Truth, A. J. NELSON.

Likes Those Eloquent Descriptions.

LONDON, ENG., July 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Sammie Putnam got up to a white heat on "Religion a Curse," etc. His declamation is almost wonderful in its incandescent flow; and his descriptive powers are charmingly displayed in his letters on the great Fair. But I think these powers of his shine more brightly when he revels in the sun-smitten rocky peaks, the green valleys, and the flowing streams that wind their way through the thousands of miles that are waved o'er by the Stars and Stripes.

That brighter and still clearer light may shine on the pathway of both of you, is the sincere wish of Yours, C. P.

Pleasing Praise.

FORT WORTH, TEX., Apr. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $1, for which please send me in Ingersoll's edition "God in the Constitution," "Declaration of Independence," "Blasphemy," "The Truth of History," and Ingersoll's great address on "Thomas Paine," and among Saladin's books "The Confessional." I think THE TRUTH SEEKER gets better in every issue. I think Samuel P. Putnam's article, "Religion a Curse, Religion a Disease, Religion a Lie," is just grand, and strikes deep at the truth.

Wishing your paper prosperity, I remain,

Yours for the Truth,

CHAS. TROTTER.

Wedded to Truth-search.

MAYFIELD, KY., July 22, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I haste to renew, for fear you will stop my paper. I call it mine because I am married to the grand old TRUTH SEEKER; so is my good wife; also a good friend, Mr. Henry Wimberly, whom I have loaned several copies. How hard it is to get men to read. They tell me they are afraid to read such literature. I quote, "Fear bringeth torment," "Perfect love casteth out fear." Get more love for humanity and less fear for a God whom you do not know. I read, I saw, I left the church two years ago. I shall never return to bondage any more than a man freed from slavery. If God has made a revelation to men, why not make one for all nations of men? If salvation depends upon a knowledge of such, if man has a future life he will know when he enters into it and not before. R. G. DODSON.

Will Spread Literature at the Fair.

SACRAMENTO, CAL., July 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please send to the inclosed address one copy of "Darwin and After Darwin," by George J. Romanes, $2; also send me $1 worth of Putnam's description of the World's Fair, and five copies of Putnam's late book, "Religion a Curse," etc., and catalog of TRUTH SEEKER books and stock in trade.

You can put me down for two copies of Putnam's contemplated new work, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." If I can spare the money I intend to visit the Fair in September, and attend the Freethought convention in October. I believe that I can sell a good number of the descriptions of the Fair. I will insert a notice of the pamphlet in the dailies of the town, and introduce it with the trade, which will create a demand.

Yours truly, R. BUTTERFIELD.

"God Bless It."

LODI, WIS., July 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $2 money order for the following order—$1 credit to the good old TRUTH SEEKER, God bless it; one copy "Bible Morals," one copy "Religion a Curse, Religion a Disease, Religion a Lie," one copy "Candle from Under the Bushel."

The books that I ordered before came to hand all right, and are good. Paine's "Age of Reason" ought to be read by every honest man with profit, and would be if prejudice would not be in the way. "Crimes of Preachers" ought to open the eyes of some of the brethren, and take some of the starch and impudence out of that class of humbugs and impostors. The other books are all right. If you see fit and will send me a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER or any circulars I will use them to the best of my judgment in the interests of the best paper that I ever saw, THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Wishing you and your cause very much prosperity, I remain, as ever,

Very respectfully, N. C. SKELTON.

News from the Co-operative Colony.

TOPOLOBAMPO, SINALOA, MEX.,

June 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I desire once more to speak through the columns of your valuable paper to the friends of Freethought. It has been known nearly all over the world that we expected to organize in May, and put everything on a sound and business basis. The big guns arrived here on the 28th of May—O. B. Hoffman, from Enterprise, Kan., who is president of Kansas Sinaloa Investment Company; Albert K. Owen, from New York, who is president of the Credit Foncier Company; the great economic writer Fleurbaey, from Europe, and Dr. Wheeler, from Colorado. These big guns, instead of going to work and organizing a good strong company under one head, have divided, and each is trying to run things in his own way, and how it will terminate no one can tell. Hoffman thinks Owen is not accountable for his acts, while Owen believes the other party, Hoffman and Fleurbaey, to be two sharpers. This quarrel has knocked ditch scrip away down to twenty cents on the dollar. My advice to friends is not to come down or invest until this fight is over. There are two hundred and ninety people here now, and about fifty want to leave. I will try and drop you a line in a few weeks again. A. BUTTERFIELD.

A Man Who Helps the Cause, and Loves His Friends.

GARNETT, KAN., March 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find postal note for ninety cents, for which you will please place fifty cents for any object where you think it will do the most good, and send for the other forty cents "Hard Knocks at Christianity," by R. Wheeler; "Was Christ Crucified?" by Bierbower, and "Pulpit, Pew, and Cradle," by H. H. Gardener.

This is in accord with the promise I made a short time ago, when I gave out word through THE TRUTH SEEKER that I had back files of THE TRUTH SEEKER that I would exchange for postage stamps; and I would say that I have not only been enabled to give THE TRUTH SEEKER a little lift, but have made the acquaintance of three of the most estimable members of THE TRUTH SEEKER family, whom to be acquainted with I consider a high honor to anybody, and may their days be long, prosperous, and happy. If I thought they would not object, I would introduce them by name to THE TRUTH SEEKER family. I guess I will anyway. They are Mr. Angus McKay, Union City, Wash., Mrs. Carrie L. Miller, Oneonta, N. Y., and Mr. Jehu A. Calder, Jackson, Tenn.—all grand and noble specimens of the truth seeker fraternity.

CHARLES GREGG.

A Song Service, Wound Up With a Benediction.

GREELEY, COL., May 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The books ordered (so far as published) reached me all right, and I am more than pleased with them, especially with the "Short History of the Bible." THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 6th arrived today, and after reading several of its excellent articles my exuberance "broke out" in the following acrostic:

Truth is mighty, so they say,
Onward haste the wished-for day
That shall open the eyes now blind,
Heal all errors of the mind.
Ever foremost in the fray,
Truthful seekers on life's way
Realize that each must fight,
Undismayed by falsehood's blight,
Though the "pilots" of the sky
Hurl anathemas and cry,
"Seek ye now the way we teach Ere damnation doth you reach."
Every person by them scared
Knowledge lacks—hath sense impaired;
Each should THE TRUTH SEEKER scan,
Read, subscribe and be a man.

The attention of all weak-kneed Liberals is especially called to the closing lines.

And now may truth, justice, Freethought, and good sense prevail until the blackness of mental darkness be forever dispelled, is the earnest wish of,

Yours fraternally, A. CHAPMAN.

Where Is Heaven?

OAKDALE, CAL., Feb. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I do not wish to trespass on your space, but I am very anxious to have this question answered. I am getting old, approaching eighty years. I have been listening to sermons for at least seventy years, all about heaven, but can get no information. The Master said, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," and I partly believe that heaven and hell are both within the human breast.

But to be sure of the thing I would respectfully ask Dr. Talmage or any other preacher the question. Some time ago I sent a few questions to be answered, but I got no reply. Now, Mr. Talmage, or any other man: Suppose a man should die at mid-day and his wife should die at midnight, both souls would go up, but they would go in opposite directions. Suppose a man should die on the 1st day of July at midnight, and his wife should die on the 1st day of January, at midnight, both souls would go up, but they would be 190,000,000 miles apart and both go out from the earth's orbit. Would they ever get together? Suppose twelve members of one family would die a month apart each, their souls would go up, but they would be 50,000,000 miles apart each, as the orbit of the earth is 600,000,000 miles around. When would they get together?

S. B. McCORMICK.

N.B.—Some preachers think that heaven is in the star Alcyon. If so it would take a soul, traveling at the rate of 1,000 miles an hour, 4,566 years to get to its heaven, as that star is about 40,000,000,000 miles away from the earth. I cannot think the New Jerusalem can be so far away.

A Hall Capable of Noble Work.

SANGER, CAL., July 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I will have to thank you for the prompt filling of my order, which came to hand in good condition. I have read the following and found them to be fully up to my expectations: "Bible Temperance," "Science Versus Religion," "Sabbath-Breaking," "What Liberalism Offers in Place of Christianity," also "Crimes of Preachers," which I think should be in the hands of all who can read the English language. The "Old Testament Stories" is a hard hit for the ministry. I have not read Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," but my wife says we cannot give it too much praise.

The ministry of Sanger have not accepted the challenge made by the Good Templars. Inclosed you will find a copy of the resolutions and challenge made by the Good Templars of Sanger. When this kind of a war is raging is the time for the Freethinkers to do some good work. This is what I thought, and I commenced work at once. I went to some of the most influential parties in the Order of Good Templars, who also claim to be God-fearing, and I made them the following proposition: If the Good Templars and churches of Sanger would cooperate in building and furnishing a hall in Sanger, with the following pastimes and amusements, I would give $250 toward furthering the undertaking: the hall to be built so as to admit of a free reading-room in front, with a billiard-room back of this, where billiards, pool, cards, and other games may be indulged in without having to patronize a bar, also a room with gymnasium exercises. My proposition was brought before the Independent Order of Good Templars last night. They thought well enough of it to appoint a committee to bring the matter before all the churches of Sanger. This place is to be open Sundays and admit all moral literature without restrictions.

Inclosed you will also find some clippings, showing some more of the hellish work of those who would "lead our little lambs." May our common sense lead us not in the ways of the ministry, but deliver us from their snares. For Freethought is the only guide to moral enlightenment.

L. A. ROSE.

We Giv the Church Laud and She Sells It.

GRAHAM, TEX., July 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have been traveling in west Texas since the 16th of May with Edison's phonograph, making it preach and sing to the people for the nickels. I found much competition, and did not succeed in making much money. Some other fellows with phonographs beat me to all the towns, and when I took to the country I had to divide my earnings with the churches and Sunday-schools.

I found the country churches renting out their untaxed and unfenced ground, which had been donated to them, at from $40 to $50 per day for the use of picnics, and the parties who rented the land would sell privileges to men who wanted to run phonographs, lemonade stands, etc., so as to make about one hundred per cent profit on the investment. From $5 to $10 per day was demanded of me for the privilege of setting up and working my phonograph in the shade of a tree on unfenced and untaxed church property. I refused to buy such privileges and came home. I found the sky-pilots competing with me everywhere in entertaining the people for the nickels.

My absence from home is my excuse for not sooner answering the article of Dr. N. A. Pickens in your issue of June 17th. I have not the time and space to write an elaborate answer to Dr. Pickens's article. Dr. Franklin said that it was not good for a man to be in advance of his fellows, and that "Truth must not bark too close upon the heels of error; it would get kicked over." I find that when I get in advance of other scientific investigators, and set forth facts which they have not reached, they charge me with superficiality and with jumping to conclusions. I admit that Spiritualism, like theology, has a substratum of truth underlying it. But I claim that in both theology and Spiritualism a sod of superstition has overgrown the substratum of truth so as to obscure the facts. This talk about the materialization of spirits is meaningless jargon to me. The words soul and spirit have evolved from words meaning breath, atmosphere. Chemistry has demonstrated the fact that air is composed, like solid and liquid substances, of electricity and matter. The word ghost has evolved from words meaning gas. Chemistry has demonstrated that the gases are of the same constitution as liquid and solid substances. Chemistry has analyzed nature and determined her constitution. When we analyze a man, a dog, a rock, or a piece of wood we obtain electricity and matter, and nothing else. We do not know that anything else exists except electricity and matter. I suspected many years ago that that hypothetical something called "ether" was electricity. Prof. Henry Raymond Rodgers, Dunkirk, N. Y., claims to have demonstrated that it is electricity. The word spirit is usually defined and understood to mean something immaterial. Matter is necessary to give anything form, tangibility, and ponderosity. How a gas, breath, or any immaterial thing can become visible or tangible and shake hands with a living man, I cannot conceive. Our school of scientists say that all is matter. Another school of scientists say that all is ether. Another school say that all is electricity. Some say that all is God. Others call all the universe, and deny the existence of any god. I do not know that anything exists except electricity and matter, and before I can regard them as being only one and the same thing I will have to abandon the atomic theory, and the inertia of matter, and the imponderability of electricity.

P. F. SHUMAKER.

Spiritualism Is Suspicious.

OLIVE HOME, CAL., July 9, 1893.

DEAR LIBERAL FRIENDS: It is with no small degree of pleasure that I read your many articles pro and con on the various subjects treated. I have read THE TRUTH SEEKER for seven or eight years, and like it pictures and all. I think I am clear out of the woods of superstition. I expect I got my first ideas of Free thought from Dr. Monroe, of the Seymour Times—afterward editor of the Ironclad Age—a quarter-century ago. Although a Materialist, yet I believe the Spiritists have got the best of us in the discussions lately. If the tests were truly made as reported, I think it funny that spirits can manifest themselves to us best at night. And there, too, must be a go-between. That does not seem right. All the old religions have a priest or preacher, and yours has a medium; and they must all be fed from the public crib and robed with the fruit of another's labor. I have learned to regard truth as being as destitute of habiliments as a South sea islander; but no, the truth of Spiritism comes to us dressed in all the sable cloth, mystic garments, swaddling-clothes, mist and fog, of the older faiths and religions. Why is it? Life comes to us in the morning, death in open daylight, naked and real, and seeks not to hide its reality, and treats all alike and is no respecter of persons. All nature is real—open to all—until we come to a demonstration of another life. Then for a real manifestation darkness is a favorable condition. A third person, maybe a fourth person, is needed. Is it not strange? One of the hardest hits the church ever got from Colonel Ingersoll was when he said, Why did not God tell the people what he wanted, not have thousands of people making a living by telling the rest what he wanted them to do? Now comes Spiritualism with a go-between, too—the medium. Brother, are you sure there is no cloven foot here? In the name of Hope, by all the principles we hold dear in life, let us be honest. I have tried faith, now I want facts, knowledge, or nothing.

Some of you say slates may be sealed at home before going to your meeting and not opened till long after returning, so that there is every precaution against frauds of mesmerism, magnetism, etc.

And the dead can write, can they? Why cannot they make their own pencil as well as their body? And they can materialize, can they, and be photographed and subjected to other chemical tests, proving beyond doubt that the dead do live? If the dead sometimes materialize, is the body real, i. e., flesh? Is it substance, as a Materialist understands the word?

Tell me, brother Spiritualist, just what you know about it. If you are prone to theorize, keep fact and fancy apart, so I can tell which is which. I have been told one can feel a spirit-hand. Is that true? And hear a spirit talk, and play on the guitar and other instruments. Is that true? And that a dress of a spirit has been clipped and the piece kept for a souvenir. Is that true? And where can I see a piece of cloth, warp and woof, made with other than earthly hands? Does it require ten or twelve yards to make a dress? And does the spirit make a new one at every visit? Are they made in modern style? And why do they appear in dress at all? Is there sex in spirit-land? Have men and women of note ever come back—D. M. Bennett, for instance? Would a China spirit wear bloomers, and have one little foot, a cue, etc.? Did ever a Bushman or a Sandwich islander come back? If so, were they dressed?

Do not let me hear of your "insincerity campaign," so many questions. I hope you will be a little to get right at the bottom facts of spirit civilization. I want to know if they are ahead of us or not. Are they more humane? Is Calvin Calvin still? Or has he not been heard from yet? I hope not.

Do they die again when they dematerialize? Is there pain in these processes?

They say you are millions in numbers. Have you all had proof direct and positive? Can I have the same, and not have to toady to some third person?

I know how to make Christians—Protestants, at least. Just hello "Jesus" a few times good and loud, sing "Meet me there," and up will come a dozen, and in three days to six months they can all tell you that they have seen Christ. They know that their redeemer liveth. And they are honest, too, or most of them are. They think that they know just what they are talking about until they run up against a Wettstein, and then, Mr. President, where was I at? Then back streams the light of reason and science, and what they thought was a Holy Ghost and a reality now fades into thin air and the mist and mirage is gone.

Are there no backsliders in Spiritualism? Have you heard of none? How can there be if we can talk with our loved dead?

Since writing the above I have read Pickens to Shumaker in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 17, 1893. Mr. Pickens, please send me a piece of one of those spirit letters. I am sincere. I wish to examine the paper. I wish to use my five senses in examining it. I believe you honest. You will not fool me with a piece of man-made paper. Tell me, Mr. Pickens, what my mother's name was; and whether there were brothers and sisters, as you ask Brother Shumaker. May I ask them of you, or cannot you tell? If not, why not? Can the dead talk to each other? What is the nativ spirit-tongue? Have they other languages than those of earth?

Now, my dear sir, there are three lines in your letter of June 17th that make me feel as Sambo did when he said, "Massa, I don't belebe dat fish story, neither." Hear it: They walk, talk, sing, shake hands, caress, kiss, and show their individuality—what individuality?—just as they did while clothed in the body. Ah, brother, I will stake my soul this cannot be proved true. If that were true, Christ may have been celestially begotten, why not? It won't do. I see M.D. with your name. As a physician, do you not know whence springs a kiss—the nectar—none of your two-for-a-cent kind, but a smack right on the lips? Get out. "Pa, can God make a two-year-old colt in two minutes?" "Yes, son."

There is, I fear, a better solution of your manifestations than to attribute them to the dead. But it will ever be my mission to garner facts.

LEONIDAS FOSTER.

There Is No God.

ROANOKE, MO., Apr. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Having drifted entirely away from the faith of my ancestors and the ancient traditions of the church, my religious creed though unpopular was neither original nor new. I am now forty-four years old. At the age of thirty I believed "in one God and no more." I regarded this one God as being the creator and upholder of all things. However, after a more thorough investigation, a more extended research, I arrived at the conclusion that a supreme being, or God, was in no way connected with, or essential to, the existence of the universe. There may be one God; there may be a million gods; and there may be none at all. I do not pretend to know. There is no evidence on which to predicate a belief in God. If there are any gods they are—though vastly superior to man—only parts or particles of the universe. They are subordinate to her inflexible laws and not superior to them; and they must in time succumb to the inexorable law that governs the ceaseless change of forms constantly going on in the universe.

The popular belief is that nothing can exist without a preëxisting cause. If this is true, how are you going to account for the existence of a God? You reply that God is an exception to the rule; that he is self-existent; that it was not necessary for him to have a beginning—a creator; and that he will continue to live on and on eternally. If God is one exception to the rule, may there not be other exceptions to the rule? I believe that it must be admitted that other things may exist on the same principle and that a God is not essential in any sense whatever to the existence, maintenance, or control of the universe.

The idea of a supreme being is fatal to the existence of an infinit goodness, for the reason that it makes God responsible for all the wickedness, wretchedness, misery, and woe that ever existed in the world. A supreme being would not allow an event to occur contrary to his will and pleasure.

He would not allow conditions to exist that were conducive to misery, moral depravity, and social degradation were it contrary to his sovereign will, his fixed determination, and pleasure. No. I would much prefer to dispense with the idea of a supreme being altogether than to entertain such crude ideas of absolute sovereignty. According to the popular theory the ability to design and execute evil is derived from God; the source of all knowledge and power. Were God to withdraw his power from Satan and thus deprive him of the means of locomotion, this antiquated old gentleman would cease to roam over the fair fields of earth "like a roaring lion," visiting the palatial homes of affluence and wealth as well as the hovels of poverty and destitution, seeking innocent victims on which to wreak his fiendish delight in the destruction of happy homes and the demoralization and ruin of those who were once pure and good.

The fiat of omnipotence cannot make wrong right. Vice if practiced by the infinit does not become virtue, or injustice justice. The gods must conform to the inflexible law of justice. They must yield to her imperative demands or forfeit their claims to infinit goodness and become devils of the darkest dye.

I believe that matter is absolutely indestructible, hence eternal, and could not have been created. Matter is infinit, existing in some of its multifarious forms throughout the boundless expanse of the universe. I cannot conceive of "a time when there was no time, of a place where there is no place;" neither can I conceive of "the possibility of creating something out of nothing," hence the absurdity of a belief in an alleged supreme being supposed to have created the universe.

"All forms are transient." There is no power that can arrest the operation of the universal and inflexible law controlling the transmutation of matter. Present forms must be removed to make room for those that are to come. This is truly a demonstrable fact.

I believe that the "powers and potencies of nature are adequate to the production of all the phenomena that exist." For this significant reason I have eliminated the supernatural from my creed. If there be any gods, it seems to me that it would be impossible for them to reveal themselves to man and establish their identity beyond the possibility of a doubt. However, should they succeed in this particular it would be necessary for them to reveal themselves, personally, to everyone before the whole world could believe in their existence. It is not quite sufficient for "Father Abraham" to say, "I have seen God face to face and my life is preserved." This, to me, would be hearsay evidence. It would be second-hand proof. I would probably conclude that it was more likely that Abraham had lied than that such an improbable event should have occurred. Would Abraham be able to discover the difference between an actual God and a first-class devil?

This alleged interview after all may have been only a huge joke, got off on Abe by Old Sooty for the purpose of breaking up the monotony of a protracted spell of the blues. It is thought that the old wag is up to such tricks, anyway.

Though I use dogmatic forms of expression in the treatment of speculative theories, I do not wish to be understood as speaking positively with reference to things that we cannot, by any possible means, know anything at all about. It is a truism accepted by almost all scientific men that "whatever has a beginning must of necessity come to an end." There is no evidence that any one special form ever existed prior to its conception and birth, hence Birth and Death are the Alpha and the Omega—the beginning and the end—of all human existence.

Having carefully perused the foregoing, can you say that you find yourself absolutely without a doubt? To entertain a solitary doubt is to abandon that faith and implicit confidence in God's word so essential to the salvation of a soul from hell. To shatter your faith in God is to destroy your belief in the devil—an infinit, omnipresent fiend. If you no longer hope for heaven when you die you no longer believe in an endless hell as being the place of abode for a large and overwhelming majority of mankind, including many of your nearest, dearest, and best friends. As there is not the remotest probability that such is, or ever will be, the fate of a solitary human being, and as it is impossible that you could ever be happy if such ever was the case, or if you believed that such was the case, you will find yourself infinitely happier in a state of unbelief that frees the mind from the horrid nightmare of superstition's benighted reign. Embrace then a system of philosophy that teaches you to look on the state of the dead as a condition of "dreamless sleep," an eternal rest undisturbed by the impotent rage of angry gods' or devils' darkest frowns.

For the inclosed fee please send me your valuable paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, for one year, as I cannot get along without it, though I have more reading-matter than I have time to read just now.

Fraternally yours, W. E. WALTON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by Miss Susan H. Wixon, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Hoeing and Praying.

Said Farmer Jones, in a whining tone,
To his good old neighbor Gray,
"I've worn my knees through to the bone,
But it ain't no use to pray."
"Your corn looks just twice as good as mine,
Though you don't pretend to be
A shinin' light in the church to shine,
An' tell salvation's free."
"I've prayed to the Lord a thousand times
For to make that 'ere corn grow;
An' why yourn beats it so an' climbs,
I'd gin a deal to know."
Said Farmer Gray to his neighbor Jones,
In his easy, quiet way,
"When prayers gets mixed with lazy bones,
They don't make farmin' pay."
"Your weeds, I notice, are good an' tall,
In spite of all your prayers;
You may pray for corn till the heavens fall,
If you don't dig up the tares."
"I mix my prayers with a little toil,
Along in every row;
And I work this mixture into the soil
Quite vigorous with a hoe."
"An' I've discovered, though still in sin,
As sure as you are born,
This kind of compost worked well in Makes pretty decent corn."
"So while I'm praying I use my hoe,
An' do my level best
To keep down the weeds along each row,
And the Lord, he does the rest."
"It's well to pray, both night an' morn,
As every farmer knows;
But the place to pray for thrifty corn
Is right between the rows."
"You must use your hands while praying, though,
If an answer you would get,
For prayer-worn knees and a rusty hoe
Never raised a big crop yet."
"An' so I believe, my good old friend,
If you mean to win the day,
From plowing, clean to the harvest's end,
You must hoe as well as pray."

From the Editor.

We are sojourning in a most charming and romantic spot among the granite hills of New Hampshire. It is known as Sunapee, and is about twelve hundred feet above sea level. Next week we will try and give you some account of this delightful locality, so that our dear family may enjoy with us somewhat of the beauties of the place.
Direct all letters and communications intended for the Corner to Fall River, Mass., as usual, and they will be forwarded here.

An Argument for Diminutiv Trousers.

It seems that Max had only just been promoted to the dignity of trousers and was strutting about the room to the despairing envy of his two-year-old brother John. Indeed Max looked so great and grand in his manly two-legged garment that kilt skirts grew instantly unbearable, and John pleaded earnestly, "Mummer, p'ease, m'm, div' me some pants too." "But, my son," replied his mother kindly, "you could not possibly wear trousers. See your legs! They are ever so much too short."
"Oh, nome dey ain't," John whimpered with tearful intensity. "Dey's long enuff. My legs goes all de ways up to my stummick," evidently believing his petticoats gave the popular impression that his nether limbs stopped short at his knees.—American Woman.

The Student's Prayer.

There was long ago a divinity hall presided over by a most amiable and dignified professor. On certain days the senior students opened the proceedings of the day with prayer. One morning a raw youth from a remote region performed this duty, and it was a memorable occasion. None who were present can forget how the venerable professor turned and gazed on the untutored lad, who prayed for him as follows: "Lord, hav mercy on our professor, for he is weak and ignorant. Strengthen his feeble hands, confirm his tottering knees, and grant that he may go out and in before us like the he goat before the flock."—Twenty-five Years of St. Andrews.

GLENWOOD, WASH., July 9, E.M. 293.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I will now pen you a few lines, as this is Sunday and I have nothing else to do. It rained all day yesterday, but to-day the sun is shining very bright. Everything looks nice and spring-like—the flowers in full bloom, and the grass so rich and green.
I will tell you something about old Mt. Adams. Its summit is now, by the most accurate measurements, thought to be 12,300 feet above sea level. It rises a little east of the central axis, rising directly from the great plateau of the Klickitat. The mountain has four summits. There is no point, however, from which more than three can be seen at once. There is one great central dome, majestic, pure white against the blue-black sky of its unsullied height. The others are broken jagged peaks, leaning as for support against the mighty mass in the center—six or seven distinct glaciers, separated from each other by sharp ridges. To one approaching the mountain from the south, the first of these glaciers to be seen is the white Salmon, so named from the impetuous river which issues from it. On the southeast side of the mountain a narrow ridge of lava rock descends from the summit, inclosing in its embrace to the east a beautiful, curved glacier, which from the canyon in which it descends is known as the "Hell-roaring Glacier." Next beyond the Hell-roaring, and pretty nearly on the eastern side of the mountain, is the greatest and grandest glacier of all; this is the great glacier of the Klickitat. There are many more glaciers, from which issue forth the Cowitz and Lewis rivers. There are many lakes around Mt. Adams—from one point alone can be seen fifty lakes.
I will close now, as this will be getting too long. If any of the Cornerites will write to me I will gladly answer.
Yours for the freedom of thought and speech, JESSIE MAY PARROT.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is a name that to conceal the plagiarism. Apollonius was suppressed.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

NOTED WITNESSES.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

LITTLE LESSONS FOR LITTLE FOLKS.

By MRS. E. D. SLENKER.

Boards, 40 cents.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stipiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFSSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Jiguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attitude at Continuity even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Faine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, $1.

DESIGN ARGUMENT FALLACIES. By the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Permit me also to add my testimony in behalf of your unanswerable logic in answering the Design assumption. I think your little book contains the best and ablest, the clearest and most comprehensive, the most rigidly analyzed and dissected, the most variously compared and illustrated view and review of this subject I have ever read. I think Paley himself, if he could read it, would "pale" (y), and find himself an ignorant sophist. Who can answer you? Again I confirm what has been published in commendation of this book. J. H. Cook.

THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS. An Agnostic's View. By Don Allen. Price, 40 cents.

In view of the fact that so many thousands of people believe that if Christ did not rise from the dead all preaching is vain, it is well to sift the evidence carefully and weigh well the arguments for and against. This Don Allen has done, and in summing up his carefully written story he says: "I close this discourse with the doubt that such a thing ever occurred. As to a future life for all the dead, we have no proof that such will be."

We can only say we do not know." The subject of the book is old and hackneyed, but our author handles it well and makes an interesting narrative of 161 pages—and not a dull one among them all.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

THE CREATION OF GOD. By Dr. Jacob Hartmann. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents.

This is a library in one volume—432 pages—history, physiology, chemistry, and hygiene, as well as a close analysis of many of the old Bible tales. I do not see how anyone can read this book and not see that people make their own gods and worship the creature of their own imaginings. Our author satisfactorily proves the heathen gods to be fully equal to the Christian and Mosaic Gods. He says: "The history of the human race begins with fable, myths, childish stories, and with idols. These prevail until some one arises and either disputes their authenticity or proves them unreasonable." No one can read this book and not at once see how unreasonable are the old Bible tales, from the creation to Revelation. It will furnish thought for a lifetime—progressive, enlightening, and radical thought.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE. By S. P. Putnam.

I hate religion. It cursed me before and after birth, and by it I have been largely cheated out of life. I glory in the man who can picture its character, and who has the moral courage to denounce it and hold it up to human view in the earnest, humane, and masterly style of S. P. Putnam. I know by facts, science, and reason that religion is a lie; I know from seventy years' experience and observation that religion is a curse and a disease, so great and all-pervading I have no words to express it. As Horace Greeley said of a certain platform: "I spit upon it, I exorcise it." I mean not any natural religion, if such there be, but the religion based upon God and a false cosmology and upheld by priestcraft, church, and state. I say a most emphatic Amen! to all that has been published in behalf of this humane, truthful, iconoclastic condemnation of humanity's greatest enemy. The book ought to be read by the millions of those who are the victims of this lie, curse, and disease. J. H. Cook.

THE ONLY FAULT—TOO MUCH FOR THE MONEY.

From the London Freethinker.

A weighty work in every sense is "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind," by Jas. B. Alexander. It contains over a thousand pages, and deals with all departments of biology, from embryology to hypnotism. The author's aim is to prove that all organic beings are both constructed and operated by the dynamic agencies of their respective environments. Mr. Alexander attempts to show what are the essential facts and causes underlying selection and the survival of the fittest. In his view organisms do not bear "marks of design," but rather of being machine-built machines. His big book is crammed full of scientific facts, which are of interest to every scientific person, whether the author's conclusions are accepted or not.

Mr. Alexander urges that the true course of knowledge is not from above downward, but from below upward. He works his own way from the elementary facts of embryology, comparative development, and the testimony of geology, through physics, electricity, anatomy, and physiology, to an investigation of the brain and mind of man. He may be called a mechanical evolutionist. One of his most original chapters is his analysis of the will, which he resolves into a mode of the motion of brain-cells or their materials, communicated to them by antecedent motion of others. The phenomena of hypnotism and thought transference are explained in an equally mechanical manner. The intensification of one faculty arises from the subordination of others. Mr. Alexander, indeed, suggests that with the advance of intelligence the human animal may have lost something of the power of mind-reading.

The mind, Mr. Alexander holds, is entirely dependent on the brain. He compares it to a series of electric lights, and the brains to the dynamos by which the lights are produced. When the dynamos are still there is no light. So when the brain is still there is no mind. Nor does he shrink from the evident conclusion that his views subvert the theory of the immortality of the soul. When the body and brain are dissolved it looks as if the machinery for the production of mind were destroyed. A disinterested observer could hardly reach any other conclusion. But in this matter we are not disinterested, and faith will find foothold when reason shows none.

Mr. Alexander devotes a chapter to "Theological Considerations," in which he shows the incompatibility of all supernaturalism with science. He says natural phenomena may be divided into two classes—things we know, and things we do not know. The phenomena not understood are those which have always been attributed to supernatural agency. Plagues, famines, storms, earthquakes, eclipses, lightning, and other such unmanageable or inscrutable phenomena have at one time or another belonged to this catalog. But he proceeds to show that the kingdom of science is continually extending. "Within these wide and constantly widening limits no phenomenon has been discovered which can be referred to a supernatural source. Every discovery has shown the connection between phenomena and natural causes; and reasoning from analogy, which is our only resource, we are bound to conclude that there is no warrant for supposing that in the secrets of nature yet unexplored we shall ever find a clue that leads to the supernatural. The causes which remain as yet undiscovered we may reasonably conclude are of a piece with those which have been found out. The civilized and enlightened liberal Christian of the closing decade of the nineteenth century, who has found out that light, heat, and electricity are not caused by a worshipful personality, but who yet bows down before the phenomena of consciousness and mentality, and invokes superhuman agency in the regulation and rectification of the human 'heart' and the illumination of the human 'mind,' is like the idolater ridiculed by the prophet Isaiah (xliv, 15), who burnt part of a tree to warm himself and made the rest into a God and worshipped it."

The only fault we have to find with Mr. Alexander's book is its size, which may deter many from tackling one of the most noteworthy productions that has reached us from America. But "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind" is really a compendium of modern science, and traverses almost the whole of its ground in most interesting fashion. It is a digest, with criticisms and illustrations, of the works of Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel, Carpenter, Maudsley, Luys, Brown-Sequard, Binet, Romanes, Bain, Sully, and others of our best psychologists. It is as full of information as an egg is full of meat. It deserves, and we hope will receive, attentive consideration.

"Tax the Railroads, Thereby Indirectly Taxing the People, to Raise Revenue for Support of the Government." This is the title of a 10-cent pamphlet by Henry Frink. Taxes have been proposed to be levied exclusively or especially on pretty much everything in turn. Perhaps some one who is studying the tax subject, and wishes to consider the effects of taxes on absolutely every class of things, will gather some notion of value from this book.

A new work is named "Ethianism; or, The Wise Men Reviewed." The wise man who wrote it, and whom we are going to review, is named F. J. Ripley, and lives at Atlanta, Ga. He begins upon ether, the substance which scientists have supposed to fill all space. This ether he says is in certain limited localities invested with the addition of individualities. These individualities do not crowd out the ether, but occupy the same space with it. The ether is dilated upon to the extent of a whole book. It forms the ground conception of an elaborate system of philosophy which is unfolded chapter by chapter. The book contains 219 pages, is bound in paper, and sells at $1.

"Charles Darwin: His Life, and What the World Owes to Him," is by B. O. Flower and T. B. Wakeman. It is a pamphlet of 28 large pages, bound in blue paper, and accompanied by a very good portrait of Darwin. Its price is 15 cents. H. L. Green is the publisher. The world can never pay enough attention to the man who overthrew the Bible doctrine of the supernatural origin of mankind by showing just how that estimable race came about through natural processes. Colonel Ingersoll opens his oration on Lincoln with the declaration that the glory and progress of the latter half of our century centers on two men—Charles Darwin in science, and Abraham Lincoln in statesmanship. The theory developed by the former is set forth in this booklet, and it is also pointed out that his moral nature was so excellent as to afford churchmen a shining example of the high character which can be produced outside the pale of their religion. The power of Darwin's wonderful mind was only second to the charm of his noble personality. He was the most unselfish and sincere of men; a stranger to that personal ambition which ruthlessly treads upon the happiness and the merit of others; devoid of all traces of jealousy; diffident, indeed his diffidence was so marked, it is not improbable that the world would never have received his best thought had not Lamarck and other great thinkers blazed the way before him. Writing of him in after years, Sir James Sullivan, who sailed on the Beagle, observed: "I can confidently express my belief that during five years on the Beagle he was never known to be out of temper, or to say one unkind or harsh word of or to anyone. The marvelous command at this early date which Darwin had over his temper will be better appreciated if we remember that during this voyage the young philosopher was constantly seasick. In after years this wonderful control of his lower self grew more and more complete. He had an iron will, but it was used in subjugating all that was unworthy of the noblest manhood in his nature. Darwin loved his home passionately, and naught but thirst for knowledge could have driven him forth on his long, perilous voyage. In his letters we catch many delightful glimpses of this strong, abiding home love, as, for example, the following: 'It is too delightful to think that I shall see the leaves fall and hear the robins sing next autumn at Shrewsbury. My feelings are those of a schoolboy to the smallest point; I doubt whether ever boy longed for his holidays as much as I do to see you all again. I am at present, although nearly half the world is between me and home, beginning to arrange what I shall do, where I shall go during the first week.'"

Gems of Thought.

THE philosopher is the lover of wisdom and truth; to be a sage, is to avoid the senseless and the depraved. The philosopher therefore should live only among philosophers.—Voltaire.

FROM BUDDHISTIC SACRED LITERATURE.

If a man does what is good, let him do it again; let him delight in it; happiness is the outcome of good.

Let no man think lightly of evil, saying in his heart, it will not come over me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; the fool becomes full of evil, even if he gathers it little by little.

Let no man think lightly of good, saying in his heart, it will not benefit me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; the wise man becomes full of good, even if he gathers it little by little.

Let a man overcome anger with love, let him overcome evil by good, let him overcome the greedy by liberality, the liar by truth.

THERE are thousands of men and women, fathers and mothers, who repudiate with their whole hearts the creeds of superstition, and still allow their children to be taught these lies. They allow their imaginations to be poisoned with the dogma of eternal pain. They allow arrogant and ignorant parsons, meek and foolish teachers, to sow the seeds of barbarism in the minds of their children—seeds that will fill their lives with fear and pain. Fathers and mothers should do their utmost to make their children free. They should teach them to doubt, to investigate, to inquire, and every father and mother should know that by the cradle of every child, as by the cradle of the infant Hercules, crawls the serpent of superstition.—Ingersoll.

Most signally have those failed who regard the supreme or absolute power as so interwoven with the things of nature as to cause everything that happens to take place by his direct influence on them. The immutability of natural laws is such that in no place and at no time has an exception to them occurred, that under no circumstances do they reveal the working of a controlling hand, and that their interaction constantly takes place quite independent of all rules of a superior intelligence, now building up, now destroying, now apparently according to a design and now again quite blindly and in opposition to all laws of morality or reason. Some of the facts that are as obvious and as plain as daylight show that no guiding intelligence can be directly at work either in the organic or inorganic formations that are continually renewing themselves upon the earth. There exists in nature a tendency to form which is the outcome of a definite formula and is so blind and so dependent upon casual external circumstances, that it often gives birth to the most senseless and aimless forms, that it is often incapable of surmounting or conquering the smallest obstacle it meets in its way, and that it frequently obtains the very opposite of the effect it ought to obtain according to the laws of reason or intelligence.—Büchner.

EVOLUTION.

The stars are but fragments of light,
Lost out of the heart of the sun;
Your eyes were once stars of the night,
Ere your body and soul were made one.
The moon is a planet long dead,
You have stolen her face, who knows?
And silence is music unsaid,
And June was evolved from a rose.

The nightingale once was a maid;
The whip poor-will but a poor lad;
He crieth of penance afraid,
She of innocence, holy and glad.
The brook was a wave of the sea;
The rain a white cloud in the sky;
The lily, a youth, fair to see;
But what under heaven was I?

The will-o'-the-wisp was a brave,
Gone mad with a lover's despair;
With a lantern he comes from the grave
To seek for the dead maiden fair.
Oh, hate is but love gone astray;
The wind was a Wandering Jew.
From night is born glorious day;
But what in the wide world were you?

A flower, a flame, wind or sun?
Something beautiful, blessed, and free?
Two souls were woven in one,
Whatever a soul may be.
Oh, what were we then, who can say?
During ages we each have forgot;
We only may guess it to-day,
But separate we can be not.

The butterfly once was a soul;
If the one that went by me were you,
In a silken cocoon I would roll,
Till my soul grew a butterfly too.
The vapors go back to the sea;
The sea into vapors shall lift;
One atom of all life are we;
All life in one atom may drift.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utility of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

News of the Week.

A CROWD of Christian roughs mobbed a Hebrew colony in Greenpoint, N. Y. When Mrs. Scheng appeared at the door with a baby in her arms and pleaded with them they stoned her. A young man was shot in the leg, and police reserves were necessary to disperse the mob.

THE managers of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal church have petitioned Congress to repeal the Geary Chinese exclusion law. They call attention to the danger hanging over the 125 Methodist missionaries in China, and the Society's property there, valued at $400,000.

EUROPEAN residents of China telegraph that the Chinese government refuses to make reparation for the murder of Wickholm and Johannsen, Swedish missionaries, three weeks ago. They request the European powers to compel the Chinese government to punish the authorities of the section in which the murders took place.

URUGUAY'S section in Agricultural Hall at the World's Fair was opened a few days ago. Chancellor Muldoon, acting for Archbishop Feehan, accompanied by the Rev. Father Barry, emerged from the private office in the pavilion attired in the robes of church. Taking up a position near the center of the display, Father Muldoon explained to the visitors that he was about to follow the custom of the Catholic country of Uruguay by blessing the exhibit. He proceeded through the aisles in the pavilion sprinkling each exhibit with holy water.

ON St. Anne's day the shrine of the sacred relic of St. Anne in the French-Canadian church of Ste Jean Baptiste in East Seventy-sixth street, New York city, was crowded. Every day at all times of the year there is an average of three hundred visitors to this shrine and those of St. Anthony of Padua and St. Philomena, both of which are permanently erected within the church and its crypt. Yesterday the sacred edifice was unusually crowded with believers in the miraculous power of St. Anne. Masses were being said all day, and offerings were heaped before the shrine. Father Tetreau, the pastor, estimated that upward of three thousand worshippers passed the portals during the day. The relic, which consists of two portions of the wrist bone of the departed saint, is placed in the new shrine made expressly for it in Holland, from which country it has only recently been received.

AT Canton, Minn., excitement over the Catholic church "window miracle," or "miracle window," has been growing at a rapid rate during the past ten days, and hundreds of infirm people are again going there with the hope of being cured of their ailments by prayer under the "miracle window." This too in spite of the fact that the real window was removed in the winter. A common pine board was nailed where the "miracle window" had been over the church door, but three or four days ago five prominent citizens made affidavit that the image of Mary and the Christ-child could be seen as plainly on the pine board as in the original window. They also made solemn oath that the image was plainly visible over the church altar, and that they could at all times when in the church easily feel its presence. This settled the case with the credulous, and they again began flocking to the village. Since July 1, 1892, thirty thousand diseased persons have visited the miraculous window, at great expense, in order to be cured, and Father Jones has taken in $15,000.

GOVERNOR LEWELLING of Kansas has, it is charged, supplanted Republicans and Democrats in the militia with Populists, that he may have force ready when the time comes for armed rebellion against capitalism. Anti-Populists say: "The past actions of the governor show it to be his intention to remove every officer who is a Democrat or a Republican. Where companies have a preponderance of members of these parties, they are being disbanded and other companies are being organized in their places. The next election will be so managed that none but Populists will reach office. Long before that time the militia will be fully reorganized and prepared to enforce the commands of officials who have shown in the past that they are unscrupulous and ready to shed blood to accomplish their purposes. When the legislature assembles it will be to meet in a building under military rule, and only such persons will be admitted as may bear the credentials issued by Governor Lewelling. That body will be organized with every corridor of the state house well guarded." Populists brand some of these allegations as falsehoods, but admit that they are desperately bound to obtain redress against railroads and other unjust capitalistic bodies.

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN A FAMIN AND A FEAST—AN OLD QUESTION ANSWERED.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists. Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore. Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism; the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Witchcraft in America.

It is not generally known that the belief in the existence of witchcraft once prevailed in this new land of ours, and led to the execution of innocent persons, as actively and as shamefully as in the Old World. That it did, however, is the melancholy fact.

During the first two centuries of white inhabitation of America, the witchcraft superstition was held in undoubting belief throughout the colonies. And persons suspected of being witches were frequently tried and executed. William Penn presided, in his judicial character, at the trial of two Swedish women for witchcraft; the grand jury, acting under instructions from him, having found bills against them. They were saved, not in consequence of any particular reluctance to proceed against them arising out of the nature of the alleged crime, but only from some technical defect in the indictment. Winthrop in his "Journal" gives an account of the execution for witchcraft of Margaret Jones, of Charlestown, Mass., who had been tried and condemned by the Court of Assistants. She treated her accusers with indignant resentment. "Her behavior at her trial," says Winthrop, "was very intemperate, lying notoriously, and railing upon the jury and witnesses, etc." Through the whole train of witchcraft cases, we commonly find the victims' assertions of innocence and reproaches of their destroyers set down as diabolical hypocrisy and malice. The pious annalist Johnson thus relates other cases in his "Wonder-Working Providence": "More than one or two in Springfield, in 1645, were suspected of witchcraft; much diligence was used, both for the finding them and for the Lord's assisting against their witchery; yet have they, as is supposed, bewitched not a few persons, among whom are two of the reverend elder's children." The Massachusetts colonial records of 1651 bear accounts of the condemnation to death of Mary Parsons, who was believed to be a witch and to have murdered her child. The same records of 1652 register the fact of Hugh Parsons, husband of Mary, having been tried as a witch, and found guilty, and finally retried by another court which decided that "he was not legally guilty of witchcraft, and so not to die by law." The early historian Hutchinson says that a woman at Dorchester, and another at Cambridge, were executed, not far from this time, for witchcraft; and that they asserted their innocence with their dying breath. He also says that in 1650 "a poor wretch—Mary Oliver—probably weary of her life from the general reputation of being a witch, after long examination, was brought to a confession of her guilt; but I do not find that she was executed." In 1656 Mrs. Ann Hibbins, of Boston, was hanged for witchcraft. Hutchinson, who wrote a hundred years after the event, and evidently had no other foundation for his opinion than vague conjectural tradition, gives the following explanation of the proceedings against her: "Losses, in the latter part of her husband's life, had reduced his estate, and increased the natural crabbedness of his wife's temper, which made her turbulent and quarrelsome, and brought her under church censures, and at length rendered her so odious to her neighbors as to cause some of them to accuse her of witchcraft." Later historians, however, are disinclined to believe that this woman was condemned solely because of a crabbed temper. Upham in his "History of Salem Witchcraft" says: "The fact is, that the tongue of slander was let loose upon her, and the calumnies circulated by reckless gossip became so magnified and exaggerated, and assumed such proportions as enabled her vilifiers to bring her under the censure of the church; and that emboldened them to cry out against her as a witch. . . . But that alone, without some pretense or show of evidence, could not have brought the general court . . . to condemn to death a person of such a high social position." Traces of this evidence appear to exist in a letter from a neighbor that has been preserved, which runs: "One of your magistrate's wives, as I remember, was hanged for a witch only for having more wit than her neighbors; . . . she having unhappily guessed that two of her persecutors, whom she saw talking in the street, were talking of her, which proving true cost her her life." Nothing was more natural than for her to suppose, knowing these neighbors, witnessing their manner, considering their active co-operation in getting up the excitement against her, which was then the all-engrossing topic, that they were talking about her. But, in the blind infatuation of the time, it was considered proof positive of her being possessed, by the aid of the devil, of supernatural insight. Joshua Scottow, a person of high respectability, who dared to testify in her behalf, met the fate common to those who in any way favored such suspects. He was compelled to write a humble apology to the court, to disavow all friendly interest in Mrs. Hibbins, and to pray "that the sword of justice may be drawn forth against all wickedness." He wrote: "I am cordially sorry that any thing from me, either by word or writing, should give offense to the honored Court, my dear brethren in the church, or any others." Hutchinson mentions a case of witchcraft in Hartford in 1662, where some women were accused, and, after being proceeded against until they were confounded and bewildered, one of them made the most preposterous of confessions, which ought to have satisfied everyone that her reason was overthrown. Three of these women were condemned, and one, certainly—probably all—executed. In 1669, he says, Susanna Martin, of Salisbury, was bound over to the court on the same charge, "but escaped at that time." Another case is mentioned by him as having occurred, in 1671, at Groton, in which the party confessed and thereby escaped execution. There were several other cases, about this time and place, in which persons were severely handled in consequence of being reputed witches. In 1659 John Godfrey, of Salem, was bound in one hundred pounds to appear in court and answer a charge of witchcraft; but the records of the events succeeding have fallen into oblivion. Goody Burt and Margaret Gifford we likewise find arraigned, without our having knowledge of the sequels. In 1673 Eunice Cole, of Hampton, was jailed on suspicion, and finally indicted by the grand jury for the Massachusetts jurisdiction for "familiarity with the Devil." The Courts of Assistants found that there was "just ground of vehement suspicion of her having had familiarity with the Devil," and ordered her "to depart from and abide out of this jurisdiction." At a county court at Salem, Nov. 24, 1674, a case was dealt with of which the record runs:

"Christopher Browne having reported that he had been treating or discoursing with one whom he apprehended to be the Devil, which came like a gentleman, . . . the court, giving him good counsel and caution, for the present dismiss him."

In 1679, at Newbury, a case occurred which will be best presented by giving a copy of the judicial finding:

"Upon the hearing the complaint brought to this Court against Caleb Powell for suspicion of working by the Devil to the molesting of the family of William Morse of Newbury, though this court cannot find any evident ground of proceeding further against the said Caleb Powell, yet we determine that he hath given such ground of suspicion of so dealing that we cannot so acquit him, but that he justly deserves to bear his own share of the costs of the prosecution of the complaint."

The wife of this William Morse, old and a grandmother, was next suspected. She was tried and convicted. The governor on the 27th of May, in the First Church of Boston, pronounced on her sentence of death. The evidence against her had been frivolous in the last degree. She was reprieved from date to date by the governor, all the while enduring the sufferings of a jail of that period. Her husband, in her name, presented a touching petition "to the honored Governor, Deputy-governor, Magistrates, and Deputies now assembled in Court, May the 18th, 1681," that her case might be concluded, one way or another. After referring to her condemnation, and to her attestation of innocence, she says, "By the mercy of God, and the goodness of the honored Governor, I am reprieved." She begs the Court to "harken to her cry, a poor prisoner." She places herself at the foot of the tribunal of the General Court, and pleads: "I now stand humbly praying your justice in hearing my case, and to determine therein as the Lord shall direct. I do not understand law, nor do I know how to lay my case before you as I ought; for want of which I humbly beg of your honors that my request may not be rejected." But she was kept in prison a long time, and released at length only to go home and drag out an embittered life with the sentence of death still unrepealed and hanging over her. In 1688 an Irish woman of the name of Glover was executed in Boston for witchcraft. From the accounts that have reached us, she appears to have been crazy.

Besides the cases that we have related, there were, we well enough know, many more, the particulars of which have not been transmitted to this age. "They were," remarks Upham, "not looked upon as sufficiently extraordinary to be transferred, from the oblivion sweeping like a perpetual deluge over the vast multitude of human experiences, to the ark of history, which rescues only a select few."

We have reserved to the last the most striking of the class of occurrences that we are relating. This is the witchcraft panic of the village of Salem, Mass., in 1692. This village, besides being aroused by the previous cases in its limits, hereinbefore noted, had become wrought up to the highest pitch of excitement by the reports of the progress of the satanic war in neighboring vicinities. The details of the cases in Newburg and Charleston were dressed up by Cotton Mather and other clergymen in the strongest colors that credulous superstition and the peculiar views of that age on demonology could invent. They were almost universally received as proof that Satan had commenced an onslaught, such as had never before been known, upon the world and the church. They were looked upon as fearful demonstrations of diabolical power, and preludes to the coming of Satan, with all his infernal confederates, to overwhelm the land. The imaginations of all were excited, and their apprehensions morbidly stimulated. The very air was filled with rumors, fancies, and fears. The ministers sounded the alarm from their pulpits, and called upon the magistrates to make sharp the sword of justice; which demand the latter faithfully obeyed. The ensuing events we will set forth in another number.

Let it suffice the reader for the present to reflect, upon the hideous occurrences already related, that they were the legitimate and unavoidable outcome of the teaching of the clerical class, which earns its living wholly by professions of the existence of hordes of evil spirits against which this class defends us. That these occurrences are the fruits of belief in the scriptures, which plainly teach the existence of such agents of Satan and command their execution. That while the clergy and the scriptures are maintained in reverence precisely the same errors and outrages must be repeated at any time when occasion has produced an unusual strengthening of religious fervor and neglect of science. And, finally, that so far astray as we of this age see the Bible has led former generations in the field of witchcraft, just so far astray will the people of coming ages see it is now leading us of this generation in other fields, such as morals, social relations, government, and indeed all in which that compilation of error and wrong feeling is suffered to touch our lives.

As the Priest Grows Weaker, Man Grows Better.

The clergy continually inform us that the world is declining in religious fervor. This decline, they tell us, is certain to draw on all manner of evil, so we must check it at once. Instead of taking the word of the clergy that it will draw on evil, it is better to look about and see for ourselves whether it will or not. We cannot take the clergy's word for it. They are an interested party. They make their living by the said religious fervor. Then if we find that the religious decline is drawing on us not evil but good we shall want not to check but to promote it.

Every glance about us assures us that the world is growing better. Every investigation fills us with cheerfulness and hope.

Pepys's Diary is a book that is being read with renewed curiosity. Pepys was an observing, chatty old gentleman who lived in England under the reign of Charles II. He records that Charles keeps a seraglio and introduces his concubines to his wife. The queen cannot go into her own dressing-room for fear of finding him with one of the concubines there. The language and demeanor of the ladies of the seraglio are such as might be expected from one of the humblest members of their own profession. The duke of York, afterward (as James II.) the great champion of "true religion," also keeps his mistresses, though not on the same scale as his brother. His grace the archbishop of Canterbury, Sheldon, the great persecutor of Non-conformists, if the positiv statement of Pepys's cousin Roger may be believed, keeps a "wench," and is "as very a wench as can be;" and Pepys himself is witness that the same prelate was amused with a burlesque imitation of a Presbyterian service and sermon "shown him as a rarity." Everybody, from the king downward, gets drunk; and Prince Rupert, when something is said about drunkenness in the navy, answers that if you are to exclude the drunkards, you would have no officers at all.

Manners are on about a par with morals. The queen tells people that they lie, and the earl of Buckingham strikes the earl of Rochester and pulls off his periwig at a conference between the lords and commons. Dueling is common. Traitors are dragged through the streets on their way to be hanged, drawn, and quartered; fine gentlemen go to enjoy the sport and see the heads stuck upon poles. Cock-fighting and brutal prize-fighting of course are in vogue, though, on the subject of prize-fighting, society at the present day can hardly throw stones at the Restoration. The Spanish and French ambassadors having quarreled about precedence, the government leaves them and their trains to decide the question by an appeal to arms, which they do with not a little bloodshed. If two guilds or trades quarrel, they fight it out in the streets, the police not interfering.

Great deference is paid to rank. When persons of quality are present at church, a clergyman commences with "Right worshipful and dearly beloved brethren." Two noblemen amuse themselves by running about the streets naked, and the constable who takes them up is committed by the lord chief justice. A knight, one of the king's physicians, having been arrested for a fuel bill of £30, the bailiffs are severely whipped and the magistrate has a narrow escape. Meantime, Pepys sees with a half-pitying eye people led away to prison for worshiping in conventicles. He sees with stronger emotion (for he has a good heart) poor laborers and housekeepers carried off by the press-gangs to serve on board the fleet and their wives weeping for their loss.

"To the Tower several times, about the business of the pressed men, and late at it till twelve at night, shipping of them. But, Lord! how some poor women did cry; and in my life I never did see such natural expression of passion as I did here in some women's bewailing themselves, and running to every parcel of men that were brought, one after another, to look for their husbands, and wept over every vessel that went off, thinking they might be there, and looking after the ship as far as ever they could by moonlight, that it grieved me to the heart to hear them. Besides, to see poor patient laboring men and housekeepers, leaving poor wives and families, taken up on a sudden by strangers, was very hard, and that without press money, but forced against all law to be gone. It is a great tyranny."

When religious fervor was great, the conduct of society was such as this. Now while that fervor is decreasing, manners and morals, though not perfect, are ten times better. So let us have no religion at all, and see if that won't help us to get things somewhere near perfect.

Few Things in Many Words.

The pope is preparing an encyclical on labor. Copies will be sent to each of the rulers in Christendom in his own language, instead of in the original Latin. It is as empty as its preceding effusions in the same line. Not a single sentence of it is really in point, or throws any light on the problem. It is a collection of vague phrases that sound pleasantly and mean nothing in particular, except that irreligion is the source of all ill and religion of all good. Leo says that Socialism has become a power which it is necessary to take into account. This explains the attention he is turning toward it. He thinks that it, or at least some labor cause, will become extensive and powerful, so he consults his interest by putting on an appearance of favor for the laborer's cause now. He aims, too, to divert the masses from the Socialism that is associated with Freethought to Christian Socialism, and in this communication he solicits them accordingly. Some of his utterances are:

"Constitutions and laws are the work of God through the centuries, as the history of every country shows. But no law which wanders from religion or tends to subvert it can be otherwise than defective and in time must come to naught."

"Society is not a human invention, but a divine inspiration, for the real social contract is not merely a right between man and man, but between man and God. Where the individual fulfills his duty to God, he cannot fail in performing his duty to society."

"The divine law has declared property sacred and inviolable—'cursed be he who removeth his neighbor's landmark.'"

"No so-called right has any sanction if not sanctioned by God."

"Men talk of reason as their guide. But the theory of the sovereignty of reason is the source of all injustice, for each pretends to have reason for himself, and each arrogates to himself the right of making his own ideas triumphant as the most useful to his country. Each has his plan of action or of reform."

"Rulers stand toward their people as magistrates of heaven."

"Atheism and a departure from the Christian faith are the great aids and stimulants of Anarchy and Socialism. The Christian faith alone is the bulwark of social order. Where Christian institutions and customs are not maintained in a state there must be disorder, bewilderment, and decay."

"Nor can anyone fail to recognize what grave errors have been committed by those governments which are hostile to the church and which would deprive her of her powerful prestige—the great buckler and shield of ruler and people. The potency of religion and charity opposes an insurmountable obstacle to the dangerous movement which human repression can only make more grave."

The above expressions, to be sure, are not vague. They speak clearly enough against reason, self-government, banishment of religion, and everything that is necessary to the solution of the labor or any other question. The parts where the pontiff himself pretends to solve actual labor problems are as vague as cloud and as idealess as infancy's babble. Yet millions will listen to or read the production with reverence profound, feel that they have received, they know not just what, but something of precious value, and render up therefor their hard-earned coin, while of the true modes of investigation they go utterly oblivious.

Our New Member of the United States.

A communication from Canada says that the Catholic priests, who were formerly opposed to annexation, are discarding their misconceptions of the effect of entering the Union. They are becoming familiar with the fact that, under our federal Constitution, Quebec, transformed from a Canadian province into an American state, would have full power to uphold the Catholic religion and its other local institutions. The account adds that the reason of this new advocacy on the part of the priests is that "they, like their parishioners, are suffering from the impoverishment of the province and from the increasing exodus of French-Canadians to the United States." In other words, having eaten up clean everything about the houses and gardens of their victims, these priestly rats desire a flow of good things from a new source to be turned on.

As to the fact that Quebec when made one of our United States could continue under an established religion, that is perfectly true. It seems to be the vague belief of many that there is about the United States something antagonistic to religious despotism—that that form of tyranny cannot be practiced within the jurisdiction of our national government. But this is not the case. The Constitution declares that Congress shall not establish any religion, but the states are left at perfect freedom, except where prevented by their own constitutions, to establish as many religions as they wish, and persecute other faiths as severely as devout heart shall crave. Even in those states whose constitutions forbid the establishment of a religion, any church becoming powerful enough could reverse that provision and set itself up in legal domination.

Of course, in a certain sense church establishment, or any connection of church and state, is un-American, and repugnant to our political spirit and traditions. This government was founded by Free-thinkers, and their intention was that it should keep church and state separate. And one of the factors of its success over the old nations has been its abstinence from the sectarian coercion common in them. To be sure, the separation of church and state here is not complete yet.

Thus, no national law is against state religious establishment, but an unwritten sentiment, a public spirit, is.

Quebec, however, is not to be expected to heed this spirit. When she gets admitted as a state she will, it may be supposed, at once set up laws favoring the Catholic church, and persecuting Protestants, even beyond her present ones, which she is obliged to keep within measure by the Protestant British general government over her.

Interest is naturally turned to the character of our new sister. In one account we find a history of the Quebec peasant. He attended mass every Sunday if the church was within reach, welcomed the Récollets, or poor friars, who tramped through the settlements; offered the first salmon of the year for sale at the church door for the good of the souls in purgatory; prayed at the angelus; sought a blessing when he began any serious work, such as building a barn, and prided himself on his loyalty to his king and religion. There were no schools outside of Quebec, Montreal, and Three Rivers, and no books save the catechism. Everybody was superstitious. Fortune-tellers cast his horoscope for two sous, a meal, or a bed; feux-follets and witches sought to lure him to destruction; a loup-garou or werewolf, under the corporeal form of a beggar, except that it had four legs, haunted Kamouraska as late as 1767. Happily, the St. Lawrence was consecrated, and these satanic agents could not cross it, but fled howling into the forest when the frightened habitant reached its shores. The peasant's life was without intellectual interest, and intolerably laborious. He was hard ground by lord and priest. Besides the seigneurial dues and restrictions the habitant paid tithes to the clergy. Originally one-thirteenth of his cereals, they were reduced to one twenty-sixth, the present figure. On a petition from a bare majority of the Roman Catholic freeholders in a parish, the priest and bishop may proceed with the erection of a new church or priest's dwelling, and the cost is levied as a fabrique tax on all the freeholders. The fabrique tax and tithes are a first charge on the soil. Protestants are exempt. It cannot be said, continues this account, that these imposts fleece the people; they would probably pay as much if the church were supported on the voluntary principle. The main grievance which they have against her is that her vast estates, estimated to be worth $100,000,000, do not pay their fair share of municipal taxation, and that there is an excessive number of "religious" both in the church itself and in the conventual bodies of men and women. The official handbook in 1892 shows nearly eight thousand.

Sad is the life of the man who has fallen under the unbroken sway of the priest, in Canada and everywhere.

In connection with the Mohammedan propaganda begun in this country, the New York Sun very truly remarks: "It is true that the Koran in some passages seems to justify the enforcement of religion by the sword, but as a matter of fact Christianity itself has relied in past times on violent means for its propagation. When men once believe that they have the only religion that will save souls, it is easy for them to excuse persecution as a method of overcoming those who refuse to accept it, on the theory that the temporal torture of a few will conduce to the eternal good of an untold multitude."

Concerning Mr. Remsburg's new book on Lincoln, we have received the following from one purchaser:

"MY DEAR MR. MACDONALD: I have just received Remsburg's 'Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?' I congratulate you on the honor of being intrusted with what will prove an important publication in every respect. And a world of thanks are due and will be given Mr. John E. Remsburg. This painstaking and sincere effort to honorably rescue the immortal memory of one of 'nature's noble men' from the selfish, dubious claims of creed, and restore it to the world-wide humanity of deeds, is a work I truly believe Mr. Remsburg will live to be proudest of. Truth, 'tis the best of us, lives immortal; 'tis what makes us free."

"Sincerely, LOUIS LEVINE."

Mr. James B. Alexander, author of "The Dynamic Theory of Life and Mind," has favored us with a paper of exceptional merit—as might be expected from so erudite a writer—on "Dynamicism vs. Agnosticism," which includes a further consideration of the subject treated in the editorial on "Materialism vs. Idealism," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 15th. Mr. Alexander adorns whatever subject he touches, and his contributions throw light upon abstruse subjects and make them plain. In the article which we shall print next week he breaks a lance with Professor Huxley, who of recent years has leaned toward metaphysics and idealism, and because of which leaning many smaller men have given the thinking world much rot and called it scientific reasoning. Mr. Alexander's paper is a fitting supplement to Mr. Wettstein's effort in the present issue.

On the 2d six of the forty-five directors of the World's Fair, and Director-general Davis, were fined by Judge Stein for contempt of court in passing an order closing the Fair on Sunday, in disregard of the injunction granted by Judge Stein, which meant that the Fair should be open on Sundays. Five of the six directors arrested were fined $1,000 each and one $100, while the director-general's fine was $250. Consequently the Fair was open last Sunday, and apparently will be each following one. The attendance last Sunday was very light. The opening was but nominal. The paid admissions numbered only fifteen thousand. The grounds were practically deserted. Most of the exhibits were veiled. Of those requiring paid attendants, ninety-five per cent were closed. The Exposition's sublime work in bettering man's mind and heart—in filling his attention with solicitations to useful pursuits which crowd out folly and vice—this work was halted that the sacerdotal profession might retain its monopoly of one day in seven.

One of the Indian potentates visiting the World's Fair, the maharajah of Kapurthala, says Christianity has been a failure in India. "The Hindoos have a philosophy of their own far superior to the one you send them," he declares. "If they were savages, like the South Africans, you might hope to effect some improvement, but as we can place against every moral maxim you tell us a much purer one drawn from our sacred writings, you can understand why the religion of the West makes no progress in the East. Education is effecting a vast change in the people of India. The British government has established schools from which religious teaching is entirely excluded. The consequence is the people have begun to take advantage of them. The railway, the telegraph, and the other scientific inventions set their brains in motion. Their horizon is enlarged, and they begin to compare, weigh, and judge matters with the same standard that other nations apply. They find that Hindoo philosophy is the source of the Christian system of ethics, and as education progresses so will Christianity decline."

Freethought to the Front.

In spite of the "hard times," it seems that Freethought is forging ahead. There is a wide interest in the coming Congress, and undoubtedly the gathering in October will be a great gain. With the promise of abundant harvests, it is hoped that the present commercial stress will pass away and confidence be restored, and all the people be busy again, and Freethought enjoy the prosperous days to come. Let those who can afford it put their shoulder to the wheel. The help of everyone is needed, be it great or small.

Subscriptions are flowing in, and it looks bright for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

D. W. Smith, of the Oregon State Secular Union, writes:

It will be splendid reading, instructive and interesting. Put us down for a copy, quick!

Katie Kehm Smith is doing fine work in Oregon. She recently gave before the State Grange at New Era an address full of radical ideas, and the applause was long and loud. The preachers do not have it all their own way while Freethought is so ably represented on the coast.

E. A. Stevens writes:

This is a supreme undertaking, and what Freethinker could possibly do without a book like this—a graphic review of Freethought?

A veteran Freethinker sends the following:

Inclosed $5 for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I have been a Freethinker for sixty years, and am with you in thought and work.

MRS. RUTH SMITH SAUNDERS.

A. W. Dellquest, secretary of the Young People's Freethought Temperance Society, says:

I am glad that the cause of Freethought is to be ennobled with such a work. It has my heartiest approval.

I am sure the following will appeal to all generous supporters:

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: I wish to enter my name as subscriber to your book, "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought." I wish to do something to help the cause along, and this scheme strikes me as being worthy of the support of every Freethinker in the land. It will give me great pleasure to see my name enrolled as a Freethinker in a book that will be read by thousands of people who appreciate that name. I shall be proud to place it by the side of other works in my scanty library of Freethought literature.

Yours very truly,

CHAS. A. ECKER.

Geo. E. Light, president of Ohio Liberal Society, writes:

Put me down for the book at once. Lively times in Cincinnati.

Another Liberal friend joins:

Inclosed subscription for your book, and $1 for your splendid "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair." I shall be at the October Congress. MRS. P. VAN HORTER.

Wm. Cook, of Savannah, puts the flag above the cross:

Place my name on the list, I want my name in the great book of the Freethought International Congress of America. I expect to be with you in October.

Capt. J. F. Rhoads and Capt. C. E. Garner, of Jacksonville, Fla., are also with us, and Ralph Helm, of Syracuse, and Geo. W. Beck, of Baltimore, and Will H. Baker, of California.

Alexander Rogers, of Salt Lake, gives a good word:

Put me down for a copy of your new book. I expect to be in Chicago in October, and attend the Liberal Congress.

And L. C. Gilmore, of Oregon, has another:

Count me as a subscriber for your forthcoming book. I like your courage and enthusiasm, and wish you every success.

Such responses from all over the country indicate that we are on the road to success. The great body of Freethinkers realize the need of this undertaking, which will be of lasting value.

The following are the names, with those of last week:

"Pen Pictures of the World's Fair."

S. P. Putnam never touches his hand to a work but he does it thoroughly and well. His "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" is no less charming than his other previous works, but more so if anything. If one cannot by any manner of means go to the Fair, he can, at home, read this book of 146 pages and see it in all its glory and magnificence. If he goes to the Fair, he will want the book as a guide, for it tells everything—just what to see and what not to see, what to do and what not to do. It contains illustrations of the principal buildings, and is altogether an excellent souvenir of the great Exposition.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

Obituary.

At Larchmont, N. Y., June 29th, Mrs. Herschel Foote, mother of Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., passed away, aged eighty-eight. Mrs. Foote became the wife of Herschel Foote in Cleveland, O., in the year 1820. They were pioneer settlers on the Western Reserve of Ohio. Cleveland was the birthplace of Dr. Foote, Sr. Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., was born in what is now called East Cleveland. Mr. and Mrs. Foote joined their children in the East in the year 1858. In 1870 the former died at the age of seventy-nine, and now the latter has passed away at the ripe age of eighty-eight years. That she remained here so many years beyond the average life is largely due to the solicitous care of her son and his sons, who studied to make her life free from worry and full of ease.

Why I Do Not Like the God and Religion of My Parents.—Concluded.

But oh, the sad sight to behold! The millions living a dual existence, traveling through life upon hypocrisy and deceit, knowing they are fooling their fellow-man and hoping they are fooling their God. And you ask me to join this saintly throng of deceit and falsehood.

Remove the devil—the prop—and the entire structure would tumble. Should everyone knowing it a fraud, but who travels with the saintly throng through interest, popularity, or fear, come out from among you, your ranks would wonderfully decrease. There are a few ignorant, goody-goody people who are honest and sincere; they believe it all and act it, because they know no better. They are satisfied with investigations made by those who have gone before them, they think it all right, and in fact do not know how to investigate; they just think it all right from age and use; they are happy in the belief that they will receive a harp and crown in the sweet by and by. Well, it is all the same, they will not be disappointed, for when they are dead they will know nothing about it, but will join the silent millions in that long sleep without dreams. "Who shall bring the dead to see what shall be after them?"

My friend, God had nothing more to do with the authorship of the Bible than he had with the authorship of the "Arabian Nights," Tooke's "Panthéon," Butler's "Hudibras," or Webster's spelling-book. It is all from the hands of cunning priests and greasy-sleeved monks. If God ever spoke to man it has been through a natural law. Should he ever speak to man all mankind will know it. He will not speak from dark holes in a language that the priests alone can understand. The language of a God will require none to interpret. But as God can only exist in nature, his only language to man is nature's laws, unalterable, unchangeable, ever the same, and their violation brings speedy and certain punishment. Hence we should study nature's laws and live and abide by them, and we will secure happiness to ourselves and neighbors.

Away with all religious creeds that bring hatred, strife, and trouble to mankind.

Happiness dwells with the simple religion of nature, not in sectarian creeds.

Would this course not be preferable to pinning your faith to an old fetish book, one line of which has caused the cruel death of more than nine millions of people? Please think it over and shudder—more than nine million human beings murdered because that old fetish book says: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live." This one line in the Bible is sufficient with me to damn the book, and its authors as ignorant, cruel brutes. Please do not call it "the word of God." You slander all mercy, truth, goodness, and intelligence.

And the chief corner-stone in the foundation of Christianity is the dream of a Jewish carpenter. This dream was never told by the carpenter, but revealed by a priest two hundred years after the carpenter was dead—and not one particle of evidence that the carpenter ever had a dream or told one. If a thousand Jews to-day should have some remarkable dreams, would you be willing to base your religion upon their dreams? No. Yet you willingly base it upon that of one said to have had his dream nearly two thousand years ago, with not one particle of evidence of its truth. Friend, a religion based upon any number of dreams is to my way of thinking, with my pathological knowledge of the many disturbing causes creating dreams, rather a poor, superstitious structure for a religion, anyway.

"Oh, well," you say, "these were prophets." Just exactly such prophets as we have to-day—not one whit better. Some pretended to be "witches," some "mediums," and some claimed to be inspired prophets of the Lord; but they were all dirty liars and frauds. They were often inspired, it is true, but it was with wine and a desire to humbug and fool the people. God never spoke to anyone save as he speaks to you and I. But why longer cling to the Adam and Eve story—the fall and redemption of man—when it has clearly been proved a Munchausen story from the beginning? Christ has already been proved to have been Apollonias or Apollo, and the picture of Christ as furnished by the church has been clearly shown to be the likeness of Apollonias. I can now see one of them upon the wall, of "Christ Blessing Little Children."

Why did the Christians burn every library they could? Certainly to hide the pagan origin of their religion. Why did they permit none but the priests to learn the alphabet? Certainly to hide all knowledge from the people and keep them ignorant, so they could rule over them by holding over their superstitious minds the fear of a "burning hell."

Proselytizing seems to be the chief end of a Christian's existence. They act as though their God could do nothing without their assistance. "I'm a soldier of the cross, a follower of the lamb." Their God requires soldiers to protect him. He is represented by a sheep, the most foolish and cowardly of all animals. God is pagan from away back. Read history and you will find it true. The entire thing is of pagan origin, and is propagated to-day by a vindictive set of pagans doing all they can to destroy Freethought, enslave the mind, and retard human progress. Freethought does not try to proselytize, save in self-defense. They know that if the church obtained the power she would destroy the brightest intellects of the world, would suffer none to live but the ignorant and superstitious. Hence Freethought is compelled to contend for its very existence, in the defense of human progress. If there is a God, he certainly is capable of attending to his own affairs without the intervention of priests, and when any of the holy sky-pilots calls upon me as sent of God, I shall certainly call for his vouchers. God has given to no one more than he has given to you and me; and I say "hands off," and give everyone a fair chance in life's race. All vicegerents of God are self-constituted and contemptible in the eyes of honest people knowing the fraud. But unfortunately, millions are unable to see and comprehend the dirty fraud that has so long enslaved the human mind and chained it to the block of ignorance, preventing advancement and progress. Sever the chain and be a free man. Investigate for self all things. Christianity received her civilization from the Mohammedan Arabs. History, art, poetry, geography, chemistry, surveying, distilling, pharmacy, painting, sculpture, mechanical arts, were all preserved by the Arabs during the Dark Ages, and returned to Europe by the returning Crusaders. Christianity destroyed everything it could, but never invented nor discovered anything, not even its own innate corruption, falsehood, and fraud. Christianity never so much as invented a fish-hook or hoe-handle. All discoveries in art and science are outside of Christianity. The Christian neither admitted nor suffered any knowledge not recorded in his old fetish book. When a physician discovered and proclaimed the fact that the blood circulates in the veins, he suffered death for his blasphemy. He that discovered the art of printing was denounced as one in league with the devil. The inventor of the common fan-mill was denounced as one perverting the will of God; and it is not many years since a man was hung in England for the heinous crime of burning stove coal. God had hid it in the ground, and it was sacrilege in the man to uncover and steal it and burn it. It was robbing God. And now in this claimed "enlightened day," but a few months ago, a holy synod of Christians declared that "it would be a sin to attempt the destruction of grasshoppers, for the Lord had sent them as a curse, and it would be a sin to attempt to subvert the will of God," and that it should only be lawful to pay the priest to pray to the Lord to stay the plague. So millions of pious Christians in holy Russia try to kill the doctor and all sanitary officers sent among them to try and stay the cholera. "God sent the cholera and all anyone should be permitted to do was to pay the priest to pray God to stay the plague."

We do not have to go back to ancient history, we see it to-day in all Christian countries where church and state are united. And when I see Christians in this country trying to subvert the government—put "God in the Constitution" and unite church and state—my patriotic blood is fired and I am compelled to say that Freethought must organize in self defense or soon all our laws and courts will become ecclesiastic and we will soon drift back to barbarism. Liberty is now almost gone—destroyed by legislation secured by the influence of the churches. I am disgusted with their audacity and impudence. If a town or village contains one thousand inhabitants and there be one hundred Christians among them, these one hundred Christians want to make all laws, rules, and regulations, hold all the offices, and rule the nine hundred infidels; and often the nine-to-one will submit to their audacity. But that day, I hope, is passed. Freethought must and will assert itself. Life and liberty are sweet, and we have surrendered long enough to Christian arrogance and superstition. We must ever hold ourselves ready to stand up and be counted and not ashamed to show our hands. Christians do not like us anyway. They would damn us if they could. Why should we love or fear them? We have never meddled with them, nor with their right to worship a crucified God if they desired. But we do object to being compelled to directly or indirectly aid in any such stupidity. And it is hoped that the people will return to the walks of private life every member of Congress who voted two and one-half millions of the people's money to bribe the managers of the World's Fair to close their gates upon Sunday against the poor laboring man. It is true their "proviso" is illegal and void, as it is religious legislation and unconstitutional; and the directors of the Fair can take the money and throw wide open their gates and Congress is helpless. It is true they might bring suit before a federal judge in Illinois for a return of the money. But the federal judge would readily decide the act of Congress unconstitutional and void, and this would end the farce. The Fair is for all the world, not for Christians. No one cares if they remain away on Sunday and every other day if they like. A vacant place is preferable to the presence of a bigoted Christian that spends his time trying to rule and enslave other people. Although there is not above one Christian in ten of the population in America, yet this small number try to dictate to and rule the world at the public expense. They claim the moral right, presuming they are better than other people. And while claiming the moral right they ever intrigue for the legal right. Impudence or audacity in this has overreached itself. The church has made more enemies in this matter than it had made in a century. I do not regret their action, for it has aroused the public to a realization of the fact that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." And from this day forward I truly hope that not $1 from Freethought will ever enter the coffers of a church. We must organize and drive the Christians back in line with other people. Compel them to pay their taxes and deny them their assumed superiority before the law and in the minds of the people. We should no longer suffer their assumption and browbeating, domineering acts, ever ready to destroy the character and reputation of Freethought and hamper and destroy its business prosperity.

I am disgusted with all this. If the church preaches, we can do the same; if they are clannish, we can be the same; and I do not fear but that the church would tire first. Christianity, I am sorry to say, is the same to-day in many respects that it has always been. It was conceived in falsehood and fraud and forced upon the people by the sword. It has always held it lawful to gain its ends by any means, fair or foul, and no fraud or lie was objectionable so long as the end was accomplished. Hence I am not in the least astonished or surprised to see the church presenting more petitions for closing the World's Fair upon Sunday than the state possessed inhabitants, for this is true Christianity—all done for God's benefit and no lie or fraud too great when perpetrated in the interest of their supposed crucified God, whom they must lie and cheat to protect and defend. I am tired and disgusted with all this Sunday business. It is a dirty fraud. God may have rested upon the seventh day, but he certainly has never rested since. The sun continues to shine and the million worlds to revolve. The rivers flow, the trees and plants grow, and all animated nature is as active on Sunday as any other day. The billows of the ocean roll and wash the shores of every continent and island in the world every Sunday. The winds blow, the rains and storms are the same. Man is born and dies the same. All nature continues to work, and so do I. When God stops to rest I will then pull off my hat and sit down through respect, for I would not, like old Jacob, try to outdo my maker. But I do not have to go to any priest to tell me anything—

By Nature's laws alone inspired,
I eat when hungry, rest when tired.

Every day is God's day. He can keep them all if he likes. He will not find me kicking.

But "Happiness is man's being's end and aim." So anything that contributes to man's happiness and does not injure his neighbor, is certainly his right and duty to appropriate. I appropriate and use everything in nature that will contribute to my "being's end and aim," happiness. Why should we restrict our liberties and privileges and live left-handed and unhappy? Let us use and enjoy all within our reach. Feed the flesh, instead of crucifying it. Now, do not accuse me of a want of reverence. It is true I possess but little for man, his religion, or works; but I do possess reverence for nature—my god the creator—and in revering that nature I think to enjoy is to obey. Nature certainly intended her children to enjoy life. If she intended anything otherwise they would not have been endowed with capacity for enjoyment. Then why should they throw restrictive restrictions around themselves, and deny themselves the pleasures and enjoyments of life—labor, worry, and struggle to please an imaginary being of whom they know nothing and never can know anything, and who certainly cares but little for them or he would not send disease, pestilence, poverty, sorrow, and death to affect them? But we will not charge all these evils to God, for it may be that God sends no curses. But great nature is ever busy in her workshop, and if one gets in the way they will get hurt, or if one lives not in harmony with nature's laws of hygiene they must suffer the penalty, for by this means the human family are schooled. It is thus we learn evil to shun, thus learn the future by past experiences. This is our schooling; millions may fall, those left learn how evil to shun.

Nature has no feeling, no mercy. Obey her laws or suffer. And now comes to my mind the words of one said to have possessed great wisdom: "There is nothing better than that a man should eat and drink and enjoy the goods of this life, and live joyfully with the wife whom he loveth, for this is his portion and all he shall enjoy under the sun; for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?"

But one of the greatest obstacles to human progress comes from the efforts of theologians to mold the brains of all mankind to fit their standard, which is but little removed from idiocy.

No two human creatures are alike. They all differ in every important feature of life. One's food is another's poison. Careful physiological research will soon establish this fact to your entire satisfaction.

But you believe everything in the Bible to be the word of God. Well, see 2 Chron. xxi, and say if you believe the younger child to be two years older than his father. My friend, study the old fetich book, and you will find it, instead of being the word of God, a dirty stinking lie.

All the prayers ever uttered from the earliest day of time unto the present have not altered, changed, reformed, nor abolished anything. It is but a waste of time to attempt to instruct God what to do. I never engage in any such folly. God can get along without my advice, aid, or assistance, and I certainly would not worship any God requiring my advice or assistance.

Every human being is born with the same natural rights. No one should possess power or authority to control the thoughts and acts of another. No one can believe anything until his reasoning faculties are convinced. Yet Christians want to compel everyone to believe their dogmas of faith, and want the state to cruelly punish all who do not believe as they do. Some one unthoughtfully said that there was one of the articles of faith that he could not believe. His honest doubts coming to the ears of the ecclesiastical court, he was summoned before it and compelled to stand while the priest burnt his right hand off to compel him to believe all the articles of Christian faith.

Now this poor, persecuted man possessed as much right to make articles of faith as John Calvin or any other person. A few bad men get together and promulgate articles of faith, then with church and state united they can easily compel obedience to their faith, and they want to kill by the most cruel deaths by torture all who do not believe their dogmas of faith. We hoped this thing had had its day. But when we see good men fined and imprisoned in more than one state of the Union for not keeping the Christian Sabbath, we are troubled and ready to resist by force every such attempt at tyranny and oppression. Should bigoted Christians force a struggle they may well consider the end, for the preservation of human liberty would justify the wiping of every priest and church from the face of the earth. We say to all, "Have and enjoy any religion you want, but do not attempt to force your superstitious, disgusting, nauseating stuff upon anyone else. We, the people, will not stand it."

But you refer me to the "religion and piety of my mother, so honest, so pure, so good, that her religion must be true," and that "surely there was a God directing her for the good and salvation of others." My friend, my mother was pure and good as you say—

In life having never done any wrong,
I hope she has joined the heavenly throng.

But there was no God directing her for the good of others. She was filled with love for humanity and desired the good of all. And when young, with her reasoning faculties undeveloped, her tender mind was stuffed full of superstition by the preaching of others older than herself, and in whom she was taught to place implicit confidence, and she was led to believe that there was a cruel devil and an angry God who would damn all mankind to an eternal hell of torment because old Eve had eaten an apple. She was thus persuaded that it was her duty to ever pray and work for the salvation of poor lost sinners. But in her religion there was not one word of truth, and she led the miserable life of a degraded slave of priests and superstition. She possessed not one particle of evidence of the truth of her religion, and her mind was so warped and stunted by the impressions of early education that she could not reason nor reflect. She was afraid to think, for fear she would commit a sin. Yet at times involuntary thoughts would force themselves upon her, and oft queries in her mind, "May there not be some mistake in it?"

These queries were prominent and frequent after her dearly beloved bishop had desired, during the absence of her husband, to enjoy her person. And it was during one of those periods of queries and doubts that she ushered into the world a little squalling and kicking doubting Thomas.

She married a minister, and was happy in the thought that "she was united to one of God's elect." Her first son was born a minister—he could have been nothing else. He came into the world the embodiment of church thought, the product of the mind of the mother upon her offspring.

I am the same, the product of the impressions of maternity. Yet how different from my brother. I was born an Infidel and he a minister, both the products of maternity, and neither to praise or blame. We are both just what maternity and our surroundings have made us.

As early as I can remember I required a reason for every cause, and one of my first recollections is that I was glad my father was not God. My infant mind reasoned that if my father was God he might kill me because some other boys were bad; so I was glad my father was not God. And to-day I am an old man, full of years and experience, and I must say that in my candid opinion and best judgment the story of Adam and Eve and the apple, and the fall of man and redemption through a crucified savior, is the most superstitious and huge falsehood ever conceived, uttered, or believed in by man. It has neither reason nor common sense to sustain it; and if there is a God, it destroys his attributes of wisdom, purity, intelligence, and goodness, and is disgusting to all human intelligence.

Now, my friends, you have some of my reasons for not returning to the God and religion of my parents. And as I am responsible to no one but myself, it is but necessary that to me alone they should be good and sufficient. The world must abide my judgment. W. B. RADFORD, M.D.

"The Underlying Reality."

It is a paradox that idealism or transcendentalism as presented to the world by many of its greatest thinkers is nevertheless a relic of barbarism and a species of grossest superstition. It may be accounted for by the strange order of nature which often causes the foibles and follies of our great-ancestors to crop out again in modified form in the fifth or fifteenth generation; or maybe, that a life devoted to continuous and intense study of the perplexing problems of nature may get lost and bewildered in the vast labyrinth of cosmic mysteries, become deranged in a degree, and thus prone to originate and accept theories strictly contrary to reason, logic, and rational probability.

Now, I am aware that in laying aside my brush and tweezers and leaving my shop and store for a Sunday's study to combat the intellectual giants of the world I am laying myself liable to ridicule and the charge of being possessed of an abnormal development of conceit. Yet, did not David slay Goliath? Blind Tom, untutored and witless, reproduce the sublimest creations of our greatest composers vastly superior to the students of a lifetime? and a shy American boy conquer the masters of the world on the checkered board? Therefore, at the risk of being likened to a sporty cur barking at the moon, I will state in my humble way why I think that of all the follies of the wise, the ridiculous attempt to base abstract existence upon mind instead of matter is the most preposterous.

I think. Nothing cannot think. Hence I am something.

Something is the antithesis of nothing, hence is something; and if something, it must be an entity, substance, or matter, and hence matter must be "the underlying reality" of all existence.

And if not matter, pray, what? If something, it must be matter; if reality, it must be substance; if neither matter nor substance, it is nothing, and consequently cannot be "the underlying reality."

The question, profound though it may appear, is as simple as A B C: The "underlying reality" is either something or nothing. Now, let those wiseacres who complacently divest matter of reality tell us what matter is; what becomes of it when by mysterious dispensation of (il)logic they have relegated it into oblivion; and then define what their "underlying reality" is composed of? Can they do it? No! They have simply mystified the problem, infinitely increased existing mysteries, jumped from the frying-pan into the fire, divested reality of, and invested an unknown nothing with, potencies to produce phenomena.

The objective reality underlying all phenomena which we subjectively perceive in its final analysis must be matter or substance or substantiv existence or all phenomena would vanish from the infinit realms of space—boundless expanse would be one limitless absolute vacuum, and the ego itself—purely a product of such material—would, of course, be impossible.

We are because we are. We are because we are a fact, an entity, not a fiction. If we were not actual substantiv reality we would not know that we are; consciousness would not be possible, because in such a case we, or the organism engendering this conscious ego, would and could not exist.

There no more exists a logical necessity for denying that matter is the underlying reality of all existence, simply because the limitations of mind cannot grasp certain psychical problems, or matter in its final analysis or last division, than there exists a necessity for denying infinit expanse of space, because incomprehensible.

I am well aware that the mysteries of sentience are still far from a rational solution, neither am I able to throw any new light upon these perplexing problems; but this has nothing to do with the question at issue, which resolves itself simply into the following: What are cosmic bodies composed of? What are the constituents of flesh, blood, and bone? What are the components of water, metals, rocks, soil, air? Are these things composed of substance or not? Is "the underlying reality" of all these things composed of substance or not? Is this substance matter? Can it be verified by the science of chemistry and physics? Is this matter something or nothing? Can it be ignored as a basis or factor of phenomena? If so, what will you do with it? Can you annihilate and banish it from the universe? And then, what will you give us in its place? It must either be something or nothing. If the former it must again be matter, if the latter you wipe out the universe!

Because color, form, light, heat, acidity, and other attributes of matter have no existence per se, and are only psychical phenomena, we must not get bewildered and assume that if sentience were blotted out, "the underlying reality"—matter—would vanish also.

Thought implies a thinker—some person, creature, or being who or which thinks. In the absence of such a living creature or material organic form, thought is unthinkable.

"Spirit" (ah, there's the rub!—the source of all bewilderment) is a name without a meaning, or rather with no significance. "Spirits" come properly under the category of gods, ghosts, phantoms, spooks, etc., all of which have no existence, per se; never have and never can be defined or proved, simply because composed of nothing. Without physique, without constituents, without substance, they are nevertheless said to be endowed with identical forms, functions, and attributes of physical beings, yet, not composed of matter; all of which proves that they are a phantom of the imagination. If real, there would, in this day of scientific research, be no doubt as to their existence; but "spirits" themselves, as well as spiritists, sadly fail to prove their identity.

"Spirits" not being conceivable to the lucid mind, nor their reality established in the open court of science, all basis for the idealistic conception falls to the ground. It then becomes self-evident that the physical organism which constitutes man or beast alone supplies a basis for consciousness and is capacitated to think—in other words, mind necessitates organism. This, conceded, proves that without such organism sentience is impossible, and this in turn the fallacy of idealism, which insists that man and the universe are but concepts and ideas, but not realities or facts.

Of course, assuming without proof the existence of a non-material entity, soul, or spirit, it is easy enough to manufacture a universe in like manner.

The mysteries of existence are indeed profound and startling, and man in his endeavor to grasp the real aspect of nature has ever been prone to offer most absurd theories for its solution, often greatly augmenting existing mysteries. But of all such attempts, that submitted by our modern philosophers is the most unreasonable.

Idealism struggles to annihilate reality and to base existence on concepts and dreams. It infinitely complicates existing problems. In denouncing materialism it renounces existence, fact, truth, reality, and the basis of all phenomena. It defies the intellect, repudiates knowledge, and ignores reason. Physics, chemistry, astronomy, physiology, and all other positiv sciences are complacently repudiated. It denies consciousness in the complex and subtle human form, and believes an "airy nothing" is so capacitated!

It is a grotesque attempt and struggle to make the cart pull the horse, mind to create matter and thought phenomena! The grass grows, flowers bloom, the chicken scrambles out of its shell, the bird flies and sings, man is born and lives, the world moves in its orbit, the sun shines, and lightning flashes and tears the clouds asunder, not by virtue of their own existence, but because of our own respective states of consciousness! It divests nature of tangibility, but sadly fails to explain or define the nature of their own ultimate psychical basis for life. After repudiating Materialism what basis has the Idealist for his "subjectiv reality?" What is this subject? Is it an entity, organism, or a living being? Has it outline, form, and organs like a man? If not, what? Can those who formulate this subject give it tangibility and form without conceding the existence of matter? No. Emphatically no!

Idealism implies that mind, instead of being a product and reflex of existing entities, miraculously calls the latter into being from nothing for its own especial benefit or caprice. Because certain qualities of matter, such as color, acidity, light, heat, etc., are dependent for their manifestations upon mind and not manifest otherwise, this is no reason why "the underlying reality" manifesting such qualities does not exist. There is no light in the universe in the absence of the media which transform the ether waves into light. But the sun causes the waves, and the waves move throughout the realms of space, shedding their cogent influence upon the earth and other planets just the same in the absence of eyes to perceive them as with them. There is necessary silence in the regions of the sun, where gigantic masses of blazing, belching, seething matter combust and explode continually, because acoustic organs could not exist there; but these movements occur just the same. The flower throws off its invisible particles on the air unconcerned if evolved into aroma or not. Of course mind is a necessity to recognize such phenomena, but who can doubt that abstract cosmic and physical existence and the regular evolutions and involutions of nature continue forever mind or not?

If we go back a few million of years in our imagination we can demonstrate it. During those ages when our globe was still in an incandescent state, no mind or subjectiv consciousness recognizing objectiv reality was possible. Yet who doubts the earth's existence at that time? If it had not so existed, then subsequently evolved into conditions favoring human life, sentient beings would never have been evolved. These geological facts alone absolutely prove the a priori existence of matter and the dependence of mind upon physical phenomena. How absurd then for a would-be philosopher to renounce Materialism! Surely ideas could not exist previous to "the underlying reality" which receives and conceives them.

The physical and chemical forces of nature embodied in matter are the sole cause and underlying reality of all phenomena. They compose all bodies, solid, liquid, and aeriform, and the ether, if such there is. They fill all space and are the sole constituents of all existence. Whatever is, is matter, and not till the Idealist or Spiritist can define what he would give us in its place can he produce even a reasonable argument against the one great absolute invulnerable science of Materialism. But this one argument he cannot produce. Because should he establish his belief on basis of fact and reality, he would have to encroach on Materialism to that extent and then humbly ask permission to enter our fold. Because outside of matter is the shoreless sea of eternal, infinit nothing.

Spiritism, Idealism, Theism, all alike infinitely increase the degree of mysticism of a mysterious universe instead of explaining it. Divested of gods, ghosts, souls, and spooks, and existing mysteries reduced to their minimum, man may at last unfathom nature to a certain extent. The infinitely large and infinitely small will ever evade the limitations of his senses, but the only hope of an eventual solution is that things are what they seem to all rational minds. And why, indeed, is it more logical to assume that things are not what they seem than what they seem?

I have no idea who or what will next pass my window where I write. How then can my subjectiv consciousness be a factor to create the objectiv reality already on the way to pass my window? I will make a rough guess and think of a beautiful woman, and see if my mind can create or materialize the concept—Ha, ha, ha! It's a boy on a horse with a little fellow hanging on behind!

Which was the objectiv reality, the woman conceived or the boys on horseback? So the universe, though void of light, heat, sound, and color, would exist though the last vestige of mind were blotted from existence. Without seeing, feeling, hearing, or thinking, planets would gyrate on their axes and within their orbits just the same. Fire would consume bodies, though no heat, light, or pain. The underlying reality—matter—which possesses within itself the potency of all life, would perpetuate all cosmic processes forever.

Fichte says: "The phenomena of the external universe are mere phenomena, reflections so far as we know of our thought; the mountains, woods, stars, are facts of consciousness to which we attach these names. To infer that they exist because we have ideas of them is illegitimate in philosophy." This is a fair sample of German and English transcendentalism, now making fools of some of our best American thinkers. Wisdom gone mad is the only proper definition. What would we know about stars, Mars, sun, Jupiter, and Sirius, if not an objectiv reality? And did they not exist long before an eye existed on earth? And what would we know of them to-day if not aided by a good solid, material telescope? Not till the material "underlying reality" impinges upon our senses does it become a subjectiv reality.

There is one important physical fact our puzzled metaphysical friends have overlooked, viz.: Atomic matter is the only objectiv reality in existence and this constitutes the basis of all existing forms. Hence fruit, flowers, trees, man, beasts, worlds, suns, and systems have no existence per se, or as such forms, but are only transient forms composed of immutable atoms. But these atoms in their elementary form vary in physical and chemical attributes, and so in infinit variety constitute all phenomena. Thus an orange has no existence as such; neither has it color, sweetness, etc., but it clashes upon our consciousness as an orange, yellow, round, sweet, etc. Should all mind vanish from existence the orange would lose, or rather not develop, its acidity, sweetness, and flavor because no gustatory organs; its color would vanish because no eyes; but every particle constituting the orange in its elementary form would still exist forever—the underlying reality!

Let us place an orange on the table before us. We behold it in all its beauty. Now let some one blindfold us, or let us close our eyes. The color and form of the orange have vanished, but if we eat it we still taste its flavor. So color exists only related to the eye, flavor to taste, sound to acoustic organs; but the original elements exist forever and absolute. A chemist can tell us all about the essence or properties of the matter composing the orange separate from its qualities dependent upon our psychical powers. Sweetness and sourness are sensations, but certain chemical elements are absolutely necessary to produce them.

So "the underlying reality" of rock, steel, heat, etc., are the elements of matter which exist entirely independent of man or beast to "sense" them. And the attempt to base the existence of the infinit aggregation of will-less and mindless energy (for such is matter) upon the psychical attributes of man is but a species of fetishism or evidences of mental decay.

On the other hand, to infer objectiv reality by reflex action from our subjectiv consciousness after having obtained such sense impressions from absolute facts must be legitimate or all our knowledge, sciences, and arts were a farce.

Idealism is Spiritualism. Until a "spirit" the shape of man is placed upon the dissecting table of science and analyzed the issue is still Matter vs. Nothing.

Woman's Day at the International Freethought Congress.

It is particularly appropriate that the management of the Freethought Congress to be held in Chicago in October should set apart one day especially for women.

Had woman stood side by side with man all the way along, there would have been no need of this observance of one specific day for the hearing of woman's voice, for her sentiments would alternate with man's as naturally as rippling music follows the flowing river. But we, who know the history of the past—of woman's past—how she has been restrained, bound by fetters forged by canon law, held in check, relegated to an inferior position on account of her sex, can understand in full the significance of "Woman's Day" at the forthcoming Congress.

The tyrannical metes and measures of ecclesiastical authority have trampled upon womanhood as nothing else in this world has done or could have done. Ecclesiasticism made her a slave, an underling, and fastened the finger of silence upon her lips.

The drudgery appointed as her portion kept her in submission until she came to feel, if not to say:

My very chains and I grew friends—
So much a long communion tends
To make us what we are.

But a wonderful change has taken place in these later times. In the light of the new dawn, man sees that he has been unjust to the mothers of men. He has been in error regarding woman and the limit of her powers. He realizes as he never realized before that he had no business to put a chain upon the neck of woman that he would scorn to wear himself. He sees that the knowledge he possesses, extended to woman, makes her not a worse, but a better helpmate. He observes that with equal opportunities, equal advantages, woman holds her own, and loses not her self-respect; and if she is no longer willing to crouch at his feet, he is more than glad to welcome her to a place beside himself.

Now, all that progressiv womanhood is to-day, and it is much compared to the past, is due to the dissemination of broad and Liberal ideas.

Freethought has been the best friend woman ever had—her best and truest ally. It early sent her forth as a teacher, and it has always encouraged her to press on to nobler heights. It has ever welcomed and lauded her best efforts. It has made the rough places smooth for her unaccustomed feet. It has urged for her the crown of equality before the law. It has striven to remove from her onward path the barriers placed there by ignorance and superstition. It has sought to place her in her own true light as a woman, intellectual and capable, a true guide, counselor, and friend; queen, not only of home and household, but of every domain where her work is needed, and equal sharer in life's pursuits, duties, and emoluments—the undwarfed, unstunted, the real complement of man.

Every woman who knows the value of an independent mind should be present at the Freethought Congress in October. Every woman who has felt the thralldom put upon her sex by theological dogma should make it a point to be at the Congress, that the world may see how many women there are who are superior to superstition and priestly influence.

The Congress has honored woman by the appointment of a day essentially her own. Let women honor the Congress by their presence.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

The Hungarian clergy are up in arms. A law sanctioning civil marriage is about to be enacted.

The French Freethinkers are to hold a grand celebration in honor of Etienne Dolet on August 6th.

French Freethinkers are canvassing the country previous to the fall elections. Their object is to down the church by legislation.

Our friend Dr. Voelkel has entered the German prison to serve out his sentence for so-called blasphemy. Another example of Christian love and charity.

We have heard about God's care and watchfulness when it regards his dear children. June 22d, Mr. Jehovah "watched" his chance and caused a panic in the Romanow Borisoglebsk church in the government of Jaraslow, Russia, and he took particular "care" to see that 126 women and 10 men were killed and 20 persons of both sexes dangerously hurt. Thank the Lord for his mercies!

Swedish Freethinkers held a very successful demonstration meeting at Lill-Jans on July 2d. Mr. Lennstrand spoke for two hours and was enthusiastically applauded. Two hundred petitions, each accommodating one hundred signatures, were signed in a short time. Another meeting was held at the same place July 30 h. Mr. Lennstrand will lecture every day from now until the Upsala celebration.

Centraal Isr. Weekblad, a Jewish paper published in Amsterdam, states that during the year 1892 the Amsterdam Society for the Conversion of the Jews spent $182,435 for the conversion of twelve renegade Israelites, and of these twelve, five slid back again to the synagog. Jews seem to have gained in value since the time of Caesar. Then thirty silver pieces was considered a bribe, now it takes $15,202 91 to make the Jewish people number one less. There being sixty-two thousand Jews in Holland their conversion will be quite a financial item.

The Swedish Freethinkers are circulating petitions which contain a protest against the state church system in particular and Christianity in general. Each list contains room for one hundred signatures, and a stirring appeal, to circulate them is published in Fritänkaren. At least fifty thousand signatures are expected. We will, in a later number of THE TRUTH SEEKER, publish a translation of the protest.

A few weeks ago an Atheist at Altona, Germany, was indicted for violating the ministerial edict of Jan. 16, 1892, by not letting his child go to church nor receive religious instruction in school. He was fined five marks by an inferior court, but appealed the case and proved to the satisfaction of the higher court that the moral education imparted to the child in the Sunday-school of the Freethought society of Hamburg was sufficient to warrant an acquittal.

They had a drouth in the country surrounding Saragossa, Spain, and the clergy, always ready to turn a dishonest penny, ordered a procession to invoke the assistance of Mr. Jehovah or some other member of the heavenly firm so as to get some rain. The villages of Murillo and Santa Eulalia clubbed together, whether to save expenses or to fool Jehovah by making him believe they all came from one village and hence ought to receive special attention by virtue of the greatness of the procession—this we don't know for certain. But it seems Jehovah took it in that sense. The procession had to cross a river. A ferryboat took the children over all right, but when the priests and the women were carried over, the boat was tipped over by a sudden gale, and eighteen women lost their lives.

It is a slander on the Catholic church to say that she is not progressiv. At Beauvois, France, the following part of a dialog took place between a married woman and her confessor:

Confessor. Does your husband attend the services of our mission?

Penitent Female. No.

C. Does he attend our confessions?

P. F. He has never attended one yet.

C. Does he ever attend mass?

P. F. Yes, when obliged by circumstances.

C. Madam, your husband is then but a heathen—a terrible miscreant. You have lived too long with him. Get a divorce as soon as you can, for your soul is in danger of eternal damnation.

P. F. But if I get a divorce, who shall support me and my five children?

C. Never mind. God never abandons those who are his servants. Get your divorce right away and trust in me.

The woman responded that she loved her husband, he had made her happy, and she would continue to live with him. The priest got furious, drove her out of the confessional, and refused to absolve her. Great indignation has been aroused in the village against the pretended substitute of God who endeavored to create discord and division in a happy family. The woman in question stated that she nevermore would put her foot in a confessional.

We are the recipient of three pamphlets by Dr. Phil. Adolf Brodbeck, Hanover, Germany. Dr. Brodbeck represents Germany in the Advisory Council of the Parliament of Religions to be held at the World's Fair. In one of the pamphlets, "Idealism, the New Religion," the author, after pointing out that millions of people have given up their belief in Christianity, states that a new religion is necessary, and that the one suited to the times is "Idealism." An Idealist believes in absolute power over which he has no control, but what the essence of this power is, he does not know. Idealism is not connected with nor does it consist of a combination of "isms," it is an "ism" for itself and by itself; it strives for the ideal in everything, for the ideal of mankind, science, art, civilization, virtue, family, community, society, and humanity in all forms. The little pamphlet of fifteen pages makes quite interesting reading, and shows, we think, the direction in which the mind of cultured people will eventually turn.

The two other pamphlets by Dr. A. Brodbeck are of a different kind. The "Life and Teachings of Buddha" gives a short, comprehensive account of the Buddhist savior; while in "Every Six Hundred Years Comes a New Savior" the author goes over forty-two hundred years of world history, and shows that an epoch in the intellectual development takes its start from some event happening every six hundred years: Year 2400 B.C., Oldest Buddha; 1800 B.C., Rama (?), Oldest Vedda; 1200 B.C., Krishna; 600 B.C., Buddha, Jesus; 600, Mohammed; 1200, the Crusades, Franziscus Assisi; 1800, Religion of Idealism.

GUSTAVE NELSON, M.D.

Who? which? what? do You Think?

You have heard, I presume, of Adam and Eve, Of the garden of Eden? And do you believe That the serpent, most subtle of beasts of the field, Could influence Eve, and cause her to yield To his earnest entreaties? Do you think he could talk? Do you think on the end of his tail he could walk? Do you think that a God deserving the name Would inspire such a book, to give himself fame?

Do you think there's a being way up on high, So cruel and beastly? Or is it a lie? Did the snake never crawl until he was cursed? Is it true, ever since, he has lived upon dust? Is it true that the devil once lived up on high? And tried to dethrone the king of the sky? Or are these all lies that we meet every day? And is it for money the preachers all pray?

Do you think that an angel ever stood in the way? And did Balaam's ass ever talk as they say? Did a fish swallow Jonah? And on the third day, Did the fish spew him up on the dry land, as they say? Did Samson's whole strength lie all in his hair? Or are these the products of the champion liar? Don't you think that a God who'd inspire such stuff Should be treated with scorn? And would that be enough?

Don't you know that all over this land of the free Still the followers of Jesus do never agree If Jesus, as claimed, was the son of a God, Or the son of a ghost, or the son of a prod? What religion we have we got from the Jew, Then why not consider that they probably knew, Would a God set a trap to catch innocent man? Did he murder his son? Was there no other plan?

If this all-wise being had even half sense, Would he have placed temptation inside the fence? Do you think that the devil is God's hired-man? That he gets pay for all the dirt he can plan? If not, then why doesn't God banish the cuss? And commence all anew, and stop all this fuss? Is God omnipresent? If so, he is in hell. Will some one who knows please rise up and tell?

Who was it advised the Hebrews to borrow The Egyptians' jewels and leave on the morrow? Who was it that told old Adam the lie That the day he ate of the fruit he should die? Who was it who drowned everything in the land, Save those in the ark? And is it not grand? Was it the fault of the beasts and also of man That God should utterly fail in his plan?

Who was it that cursed the land for our sake? Who was it who made the devil and snake? Who was it who gave the devil his power? And is not the devil this God's right bower? If a man reads this book and uses his brain Can't he tell why so many saints (?) are insane? Can you show me a place in this filthy old book Where the devil's disgraced by word or by look?

In a certain old adage, I think you will find That "birds of a feather will go with their kind;" Don't the churches take in anyone who'll apply—Thieves, robbers, or cutthroats? Now, is this a lie? Don't you think where these all meet on a level Would be a disgrace to a half-decent devil? Are the church people honest? Do they all pay their dues? Please examine them all as a class, if you choose.

Is mankind any better for believing a lie? Does a three-headed God inhabit the sky? The myths of the Bible why not lay aside? Why not consider all miracles "snide?" Why not be a man; and acknowledge at once Such teaching as that will do for a dunce? Then why should mankind place any reliance In any religion that conflicts with science?

KLAXTA CUMTUX.

The Church and Temperance—One Instance.

One of the most congenial men I ever knew was the late Hon. Charles S. Wolfe. With his nervous, irritable, restless disposition he was an exact counterpart of Horace Greeley. In home and social life Mr. Wolfe was honest, industrious, courteous—an ideal man. His political aspirations ran away with his better judgment. He knew no bounds. He did not stop until the famous Pittsburg thieves were brought up before the Pennsylvania legislature and convicted. But all this has been recorded in history fifteen years ago. It is said that Ex-Secretary of War Cameron and his followers were opposed to Wolfe in his wholesale slaughter, and to show the overwhelming influence of those men the pardon board met the very next day and pardoned the thieves.

That is the political history of Charles S. Wolfe, so far as the Republican party is concerned. He openly confessed that he did not like "the past history of the Democratic party or the present doings of the Republican party."

Mr. Wolfe was a Christian; the people as a body admired him; the church began to boom him for governor of the state on the Prohibition ticket.

He threw his whole soul into the canvass, and he did not have the least idea that God's people would be so cruel as a political party, especially since the church had pledged itself to him irrespective of former political faith.

He honestly believed the church would practice what it preached, and he would be elected.

One morning a few days before the election I met Mr. Wolfe in his native town. We had known each other for years, and this being the case, he did not hesitate to talk with me in glowing terms of the temperance party and the people who would vote for the cause, of their purity, honesty, etc.

"Well, Charley," said I, "I admire you and the temperance cause, but you have a heavy load to carry."

"And what is that load?" inquired the quick and nervous Mr. Wolfe.

"Why, sir, you have the church to burden you."

Patting me on the back, he said:

"Young man, the church will stand by me in the cause of temperance. They dare not desert the cause and have any claim on Christianity."

The election passed off, and while Mr. Wolfe ran somewhat ahead of the ticket, the whole was one of the worst defeats that party ever knew. I never saw Mr. Wolfe after that. Only a short time before his death I read the following interview in the Philadelphia Times, Mr. Wolfe speaking of church-members who had sold themselves to the devil:

"And if this state of affairs continues until after I am dead and buried in yonder cemetery, I want one word carved upon my tombstone, and that word is 'Deserted'—so that when the stranger pauses beside my resting-place and inquires what it means he shall be told that there lies a man who entered the political arena, and when comparatively young gave the best of his time, talent, and work to the great cause of honest reforms in their behalf; and that when he rose to a certain point, and had accomplished more than he or his friends had ever reasonably expected for the purification of his party and the good of the people of the entire commonwealth, he was 'deserted' by the people he had championed; he was 'deserted' by the friends he counted on standing by him in the battle for reform; he was 'deserted' by the Christian church and its members in his martyrdom for the right."

Despised by his old party (Republican), deserted by the church, the Democrats afraid of him, Charles S. Wolfe, among the brightest men this state ever knew, died a political wanderer. And now, when I look in through the open doorways of churches and hear ministers pleading for money to put down the evil of drink, and when I hear the money dropping into the churches' coffers, I am tempted to cry out: "Stop thief! Police! Police!"

He will lecture in Michigan during September.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH has just delivered a successful course of lectures in Delphos, O. During his visit in that town, a branch organization of the Freethought Federation was inaugurated. The society has started out with forty members, among whom are quite a number of ladies. A Freethought library will be established for the use of its members. Friends having books they could donate may send them to the secretary, by whom they will be gladly received. The society has good prospects before it, and they will send a large delegation to the International Congress. The officers elected are as follows: President, Louis Eysenbach; vice-president, Mrs. H. H. Brundage; secretary, B. A. Roloson; treasurer, Jos. Roth.

How to Help The Truth Seeker.

1. When renewing get a friend to subscribe and thus save a half dollar apiece.
2. Get your newsdealer to display it on his stand or in his shop window. Be sure that he displays the pictures.
3. Get your newsdealer to keep in stock one or more copies, with your guarantee to take off his hands at the end of the week any that remain unsold. If he exhibits them the pictures alone will sell them.
4. Take a few extra copies and circulate them among your acquaintances. On your request, we will send you back-number sample copies free.
5. Leave a copy occasionally where it will be picked up—in the train, in the factory, in the meeting-room, in the cigar store, in the barber-shop. Leave it picture-side up.
6. Keep in your pocket some of our cheap tracts and when convenient hand one to a friend.
7. Get a new subscriber by persuading some friend to take it.

An Untirable Missionary.

WEEDSPORT, N. Y., July 26, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: My subscription for your valuable paper has expired. I will not do without it—I cannot do without it. Inclosed find $3 to pay for the best paper in the world another year. I have tried in vain to get some subscribers. But I will keep on trying. Yours for truth,

WM. SLAUSON.

Hail to an Agnostic Society.

WHITE OAKS, N. M., July 21, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find herein inclosed $3, for which you will please send me THE TRUTH SEEKER. There are but two Liberal publications taken at this place—Independent Pulpit and Boston Investigator. Liberals are in the majority here by far, though but few are very pronounced in their views. We are on the eve of organizing an Agnostic society. I think we can organize with a membership of about one hundred to begin with. That will be considerably in excess of actual church membership. Yours truly,

P. S. TATE.

Expects Much of That Book.

GREENSBURG, IND., July 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find order for $6, with which to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER and also to pay for your publications for 1893 in THE TRUTH SEEKER LIBRARY. I wish also to subscribe to Mr. Putnam's book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I shall look forward to that book with great interest, expecting it to equal in brilliancy the life of Wendell Phillips, written by Carlos Martyn. If so, its reading will be grand entertainment for my old age. I am nearly seventy-four years old, and am well pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Rival Missionaries.

DE RUYTER, N. Y., July 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Do you know that some valiant Christian is doing missionary work among THE TRUTH SEEKER contributors? Since my brief letter some weeks since I have received tracts from religious seed-sowers. How would they like it, I wonder, should some ungodly Infidel send skeptical leaflets to the innocent little contributors of Sunday-school papers? One can almost hear the howl of indignation that would go up from such turning of their own weapons upon them. I will not even suggest that some wealthy Freethinker thus use some of his time and means, yet it might lead a few of the lambkins to light.

W. W. AMES.

The Freethinker's Badge.

MILL CITY, PA., July 28, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me "Crimes of Preachers," and oblige. I have the badge I sent for, and I am not ashamed to wear it. Quite a number of persons have stepped up to me and asked me what it meant. I tell them to read it. One said, "I never have seen one like it." He did not know what it meant. I told him that he did not keep himself posted. Another asked me where we held our meetings. I told him all over the world, and that our lodge was increasing faster than all other lodges combined, and that we would scoop up all the rest. He was a pilot. He walked away and said nothing.

So, long may the banner of Freethought wave over the land of the free and the home of the brave.

JAY GOULD'S "MEMORIAL CHURCH."

Let those who will, and can, rear for this wonderful man

A stone.

Fit emblem it would be of the flinty heart which he Held alone.

But why a palace church raise, to sound peans of praise

To God?

Then carve upon its altar cross-bones and hangman's halter

For Gould.

And in the center overhead, in memory of the dead,

Grab-hooks
Holding U. P. securities, and, with countless superfluities,

Bank-books.
Then to woo back his spirit, ye who his wealth inherit,

Giv bond,
To erect a massiv golden bell, to be heard in heaven or hell,

'Twill come.
Such music, I must insist, Jay's spirit could ne'er resist,

Not much.
His heaven, my fancy paints, would be to "corner" all the saints,

First touch.
And he'd ne'er relax his hold, till they were ransomed with pure gold,

Or equivalent.
Such a grasping nature here, will be found most surely there Still prevalent.

Yet, I've pity for poor (?) Jay Gould, he'd been different if he could—

"Had to."
Environment made him thus, as it does the best of us,

Bad too.
I'm not sure but every man does the very best he can,

Hav charity.
We may evolve to deal with others as though they were our brothers,

Now rarity.
In that happy time to come, with no "Rebellion, Rome, or Rum,"

All peace,
Wars of Christian subjugation will have had their consummation

And cease.
Then for fear of retrogression, I hope the long procession

Will stop.
Let Gabriel blow his horn, come the resurrection morn,

All "kerflop."

An Efficient Worker and Pointed Talker.

CRAYON, O., Apr. 27, E.M. 293.

MR. EDITOR: After an interval of two years, I shall again contribute a letter to the columns of a journal whose peer is not to be found on this side of the "mystic beyond"—viz., the grand old TRUTH SEEKER. I am conscientious in this statement, it being justified by an experience of nine years with the paper and its various publications. In all these years I have been a constant worker for the cause of Liberalism by using it as a missionary document among my associates, and presenting its principles to the saint and sinner, as well as the sky-pilot himself, in a way that I feel that good has been accomplished.

I look upon the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday as a calamity, short of ridiculous, to the natural rights and moral impulses of the American people, as well as those of the entire world. It is an act looking to the interests of the churches, saloons, and other immoral places of Chicago, and sanctioned by the devotees of superstition and priestly bigotry throughout the world.

There is quite a number of Freethinkers in this part of the country, among which myself and a few others are the only outspoken ones. The rest, on account of their vocation in life and social surroundings, have submitted to Mrs. Grundy.

During a protracted meeting in one of our villages this winter, the minister took the liberty to misrepresent science and history in regard to his religion, when one of our reputable citizens, who is an ardent Liberal, took exceptions to it, and wrote him a letter. This caused a couple of exchanges between the two on the subject, until our Liberal friend gave him the ultimatum in a mammoth missive which contained such an array of historical facts, science, and logic that the man of God was completely knocked out. He sought to vindicate himself and appease his pious anger by hurling from his pulpit the most unbecoming epithets that his regenerated mind could conceive of, thus receiving the censure of his own flock and the contempt of fair-minded people. This has agitated thought on the question and ultimate good will be the result.

Some of our ministers speak of Freethinkers as "narrow-minded Infidels." Is not this a shame when we think of such intellectual giants as Col. R. G. Ingersoll, S. P. Putnam, and many others? Who but a dishonest, devising priest or sky-pilot could utter such an absurdity as this? For my part, I am not so in pursuit of anything at the hands of Christians, or any popular craze that, by chance, might be thrust upon the people, but that I can proclaim the principles of THE TRUTH SEEKER wherever I go and still be successful in my legitimate requirements. I have no aspirations for the future with respect to fame or fortune that would cause me to be a mental slave or advocate principles that conflict with my better judgment. Therefore I shall ever be found, bold and fearless, working for the cause of humanity and the destruction of superstition.

I herewith send you a renewal of my own subscription, together with a couple of new ones, and will say in conclusion, may the grand old TRUTH SEEKER and its principles ultimately prevail.

ELMER MILLER.

Off-refuted Slanders.

LA MINE, Mo., July 28, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to inform you and the readers of the best paper on the globe, THE TRUTH SEEKER, that I have recently made a very important discovery. I have without a doubt found the missing link, the ape-man, that long-sought personage that has so long baffled the skill of our greatest men. In proof of my statement I have copied from the Western Christian Union the following article, which I think is unmistakable proof. The article is headed thus: "The Mistakes of Ingersoll on the Inspiration of the Bible." H. L. Hastings, the eminent author-publisher of Boston, has the following to say concerning America's foremost skeptic: "I have heard of a man traveling around the country showing up the mistakes of Moses—it would be interesting to hear a military leader and legislator like Moses, the man of God, who after he was eighty years old commanded for forty years an army of six hundred thousand men, emancipating, organizing, and giving laws to a nation which has maintained its existence for more than thirty stormy centuries, give his candid opinion concerning the mistakes of a colonel of cavalry whose military career is said to have included a single engagement, in which he was chased into a hog-yard and surrendered to a boy of sixteen, after which as soon as exchanged he heroically resigned his commission in the face of the enemy, subsequently turning his attention to managing swindling whisky rings, discussing theology, defending scoundrels, blaspheming God, and criticising dead men who cannot answer him." Thus ends the article. There are plenty of damned fools that will read such nonsense as is contained in said article and tell you that Ingersoll has been answered. They never read a line of Mr. Ingersoll's works, and if they did they haven't got brain enough to understand him.

Now, I want to ask the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER if they think it necessary to go back to the dug-out to produce the ape-man.

Mr. Editor, please find inclosed a list of names of Liberals I wish you to send sample copies to.

A. J. BRIGGS.

Hell.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: One of the blatherskites, Rev. E. Hathaway, held forth in his church the other evening on the situation of hell. Who could tell where the place of hell was? said he. It may not be pleasant to contemplate, but some unpleasant things command our attention and require consideration. The Christian church has for a leading teaching the dogma of an endless hell—torments in the future world—and made belief in it the test of membership. Can this be true, that they cannot tell where it is after preaching about it for these many years? True, enlightened reason is against the doctrine of a hell and the government of a wise and just God. All the finer feelings of the human soul are against it. How different is this word "hell" from what it was a century ago—yes, a half a century. Hell or no hell is the question that will confront the Presbyterians' general assembly on their meeting at Washington.

We believe in our Ingersoll, who takes up the word "hell" as it has been used by ministers and finding it on the pages of the Bible, believes it a lie—that the Bible teaching is a libel on the character of the creator.

The eminent divines cannot locate the place.

Only see what the new version has done with the word—reduced it from the twenty-fourth time of its occurring in the New Testament to twelve, and in the Old from thirty-two to thirteen. I think that any thoughtful reader—and he need not be a Hebrew or a Greek scholar—cannot help seeing a great significance in the change.

So you see Freethought and reason are making rapid progress among the people, with THE TRUTH SEEKER as a pioneer.

A neighbor, a Methodist, after reading the new version said she did not like the new Bible at all—now they had taken hell out of the Bible, the next thing they would do would be to take heaven out, then there would be no Bible left.

The mountebank Talmage, at a meeting at Monona lake last week, said that Voltaire on his death-bed sent for a priest, so that he could be reconciled to the church before he died, and that great terror fell upon him; that he made the place all around him so dismal that the nurse declared that she would not for all the wealth of Europe see another Infidel die. Is that account true, or did Talmage tell a lie? I have to fight this thing, and wish to be posted as to the truth or falsehood of the assertion. I have always thought that Voltaire was an extraordinary character, who exerted his powerful talents to promote the cause of freedom, humanity, and reason; that he was a Freethinker, and that was the reason they called him an Infidel. There are many such—"O Father Abraham," what will not these Christians resort to, to defame a good man's character?

The Jesuit priest wished to bring Voltaire to acknowledge the divine nature of Jesus Christ, and shouted in his ear, "Do you believe the divinity of Jesus Christ?" "In the name of God, sir, speak to me no more of that man, but let me die in peace."

Few men ever existed whose lives have been honored by more conspicuous worth.

S. R. THORNE.

[The death of Voltaire and other prominent Infidels is described in the pamphlet, "Infidel Death-beds," advertised in this paper.—ED. T. S.]

An Attempt at Socialism.

SINALOA, MEX., July 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I will write a few lines today, for there are a great many of your readers anxious to hear from this place. About thirty-one colonists left in disgust on the last boat about ten days ago, and there are some thirty or forty more intending to leave as soon as they can get away. The people leaving are going away because they dislike the way it is managed. The men worked hard here, expecting when a crop would be raised that it would be sold and the money used to buy groceries and clothing, as we have had but little of the former and none of the latter for the past two or three years; but instead Owen came down here and domineered everything. He was dead broke when he got here, and has had to pay some fines, so I have been told; and he has kept a Mexican officer to guard him, not because his life was in danger, however, but for show; and the money has all been used up. Men are ragged and children too, and have not one cent for groceries. The Credit Foncier store has dwindled down to seven boxes of matches, one pocket-handkerchief, three cakes of soap, fifty packages of cigarets, and a few carrots, beats, and tomatoes. They charge cash for everything nearly, except carrots, beats, and tomatoes. The governor is here now, and Mexican judges, and what will be the outcome I cannot tell as yet. Hoffman and Fluerschm organized the kickers and they seem to be getting along all right, but Owen swears he will drive them out.

For the last month Owen and Wilbur have been making constitutions and by-laws. I think they will be through in a month or six weeks, and then I will write again.

At this writing the Credit Foncier company is entirely out of flour, meat, sugar, and cash. Owen was unable to bring a supply down with him, while Hoffman brought the kickers a good supply. As these goods were shipped in the name of the Credit Foncier company, Owen stopped them at the custom-house in order, he said, to show Hoffman that he, Hoffman, had no power in Mexico. Mr. Hoffman was able in a day or two to deliver the goods to the rightful owners. Nothing has been done on the railroad yet, but I believe Mr. Owen intends building it next month. That is what he says. There has been much lying done through the columns of the paper printed here. From forty acres of potatoes they sold for cash $644 worth instead of $50,000 worth. They have never cut a bit of alfalfa hay, and will not for some time. They have no saw-mill. It played out two years ago. There is no school here. We live in brush houses and tents yet. The company has no dairy. They milk fourteen cows and get no more than six or eight quarts of milk. The company owns no hogs. They did own one, but after keeping it six months Mr. Law, farm director, concluded that it did not pay to keep hogs, so he sold it for $3. These are facts. We have lots of vegetables.

Our Reply Is, Conversion Is Not Hypnotism.

ALBIA, IA., July 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: When the ignorant who claim to have experienced the influence of that mysterious member of the "God-head" called the "Holy Ghost" come to investigate the matter thoroughly they will have to admit that they were under the influence of hypnotism.

My young readers may not know what I mean by the term hypnotism. It is the same as mesmerism. It is the power that one person has over another to induce sleepiness and lack of will power.

When hypnotism becomes better understood there will be more pity for the poor girl who has been brought to disgrace by the influence of some young rascal who gets her in his power.

Many may read this who do not believe anyone can have such influences over another as I am about to relate. I can furnish abundant proof if necessary.

A man came to our town who claimed he could hypnotize people and make them do as he pleased. I did not believe he could; but he took a schoolmate of mine, who was temperate, honest, and a model young man, and after rubbing his head and drawing his attention by counting his pulse he made him imagine he was drunk, and he would stagger like a drunkard. He told him he was freezing, and the boy held his hands up before an imaginary stove and rubbed them and shivered until his teeth rattled. He then told him that he was too warm, that he was burning up, and the boy took off his coat and vest and was commencing to take off his pants when the performer snapped his fingers in his face and told him to awaken, and he did and he felt sold to find himself nearly undressed before a house full of people.

I am a teacher in the country school. This man took one of my pupils whom I know to be an exceptionally strong-minded and self-willed boy, and after putting him under the influence of hypnotism he gave him a large onion and told him it was an apple. The boy ate it before a large crowd of people who will all testify that he acted as if he relished the imagined apple. He put a dirty-faced boy beside him and told him he was in a buggy beside his girl, and the boy put his arm around his imagined sweetheart and held the lines in his other hand and drove the horses in a peculiar way that his father had of taking when driving a team. I asked the boys if they knew what they were doing. They said they did, but could not help doing as the man told them.

Now, I have related a story to which I can furnish fifty sworn testimonies that it is true, and the Christian people who witnessed it thought the man was in league with Satan.

I wish to relate another story and then I wish to ask you a question. There was a Methodist revival near my home which closed a few weeks ago. I attended pretty regularly to discover, if I could, what to attribute this feeling that Christians experience to. They had not much success for a long time until a young girl and an old lady got to rubbing people's heads, and praying until you could hear them a quarter of a mile away; and they created quite an excitement and drove the devil clear out of town, unless perhaps there was a small devil left in my heart. I had an experience that I did not intend to relate here, but for the sake of showing you how I make the preacher responsible for my soul I will tell you. The preacher came and laid his hand on my shoulder and said: "Friend Lanning, I hear you are an infidel. If you can tell me you are not I want to ask you a question or two, but if you are I do not wish to talk to you." I replied, "Do you think an infidel has no soul to save?" He said, "A man who denies the Bible is damned. Do you believe the truths of divine inspiration?" I replied: "I will answer that by asking you the same question. Do you believe all the Bible?" He answered: "Most certainly I do." "Do you," I asked, "think Christ meant it when he promised you everything you should ask in his name?" He said he did. "Then," I replied, "I ask you to pray for my conversion, and I want you to ask your congregation to do likewise, and if you are believers your prayers must be answered. I want to be prayed for tonight, and if your prayers are answered I will join this church to-morrow night; and I will think if I am not converted and made to believe as you do that you are not of the number to whom Christ gave his promise." He was cornered. He said he would do all he could for me and would ask his congregation to assist him. I remained at home the next evening, and went the next. I never was asked how I felt, and all that preacher ever tried to do for me was to report to his congregation that I am an infidel, hopelessly damned.

But to my story. There was in that congregation a young man who had been converted, but by having some trouble with a young lady who would not allow him to escort her to and from the Epworth League, he had fallen from grace. He was anxious to get out of his "awful and undue" condition, and after allowing his elderly sister to rub his head and pray and "pow-wow" over him he went off into a trance, or, as the Christians said, he was so stubborn that God was obliged to take away his reason in order to allow the Holy Ghost to enter his heart. He is a school-teacher, and a very strong-minded man, and I have never known him to be dishonest. Now for my question: Is conversion the same as hypnotism? or did I in these cases see the workings of good and evil spirits? S. J. LANNING.

P. S.—If you don't want to insult your Christian friends, don't tell them conversion can all be attributed to natural causes. S. J. L.

Mental or Industrial Freedom First?

GRAND MOUND, IA., July 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Your attempt to prove the proposition that "Mental freedom must come before industrial or economic reform will be more than a temporary hope and illusion," is before me. And notwithstanding you say, "The proposition is self-evident," you have failed utterly to prove even one side of it. To the superficial thinker and observer, I have no doubt the truth or falsity of the statement will appear of very little moment or account, yet nevertheless it is of vital importance to the individual, society, and the nation, under existing conditions. Of course the "history of Christianity proves that" some members of the Christian organization, notably its priests and church dignitaries, have figured as the partners, or pals, of the state—Uncle Sam—and have "held back the world in every reform as well as every science." But it is the "taxing machine," and the privileged class, that are the real culprits. Under the name of law (but really in opposition to our fundamental law) our government officials virtually "steal us blind," and divide the "swag" with the bullionists, bankers, and church dignitaries. Hence, Voltaire, Paine, and their compeers clearly saw that while the people were in physical, or industrial slavery, their mental faculties were impaired, their spirit of independence void, in short, they had no just conception of their natural or legal rights; but were just in that abject, servile condition to be victimized by the religious propagandist. Hence, they, and nearly all of the old guard of Liberalism previous to the Rebellion, demanded physical or industrial liberty—freedom from the law, which imposes a tax to support a privileged class. "Free trade and sailors' rights, equal rights and privileges, and equality before the law," and not "mental liberty," was the issue—the rallying-cry of the fathers of the republic previous to and during the war of the Revolution, and the issue was fought out and fairly won. But the Tory element in America, led on by Hamilton, did not believe in equal rights and privileges. They were the class of citizens who were living an indolent life upon privileges granted by the tyrannical laws of England—the mother country—and scouted the idea that the people were capable of establishing a government by the consent of the governed. They were opposed to a separation from England, fought the idea of organizing a democracy from its inception; hence, as soon as "our bugles sang truce," and peace was declared, they began scheming to inaugurate measures to subvert the principles of the Constitution. Hamilton voiced the sentiments of the Tory element—the privileged classes of his time—when he boldly and often declared "the Constitution a thing of nothing, which must be changed," and "the rich and well born" (whatever that is) "should rule and govern the people." With these sentiments in view said element procured the most important cabinet position in the gift of the president, the chief magistrate of the nation; for their leader, Hamilton. Through intrigue, deceit, and treachery he, aided by his pals, the priests, bankers, and bullionists, succeeded in bulldozing Congress into adopting England's monetary system, as the fiscal policy of the young republic—a system which for thievery and downright robbery by so-called law not only "takes the cake," and beats the chattel slave code two to one, but is in direct violation of the supreme law of our nation, the sacred compact entered into by the fathers, after they had fairly won on the issue of equal rights and privileges. There are positively no two opinions among intelligent, unprejudiced thinkers, who have taken time to investigate this damnable and inhuman system; they all agree.

To sum it up in a few words, strip it of its verbiage—the system consists in first creating by so-called law a fraudulent, perpetual public debt called gold and silver money. Then, in order to compel or force the people to redeem or float this debt, our agent, Congress, enacts a law making it a legal tender for all debts and taxes. But the iniquity of this system does not end here.

The bankers and bullionists, who from the dawn of so-called civilized governments have held a strict corner on or monopoly of the material or substance upon which this debt is coined, stamped, or printed, procured the passage of a law by which they may loan their money (which they obtained as a gratuity) to the government, and thus tax every legitimate industry to pay usury, interest, or tribute to them.

During the struggle to perpetuate chattel slavery, this fraudulent perpetual public debt (gold and silver money) culminated in a fraudulent bonded debt; and the monied oligarchy, the usurers, or privileged classes, in order to rob all of their own class who operated in silver, and also to make the bonded debt perpetual, prevailed with Congress to pass a law allowing the holders of all obligations to repudiate money stamped on silver if presented or tendered in sums above $5.

Now, this act of Congress, together with the act which allowed the bondholders to repudiate all of the greenbacks except sixty millions of dollars, is downright robbery of the masses to enrich the classes, and was denounced at the time in and out of Congress, by both Republicans and Democrats. In fact, the financial policy was inaugurated by the Tory element during Washington's first administration, and which was persisted in by the proslavery element in the North during the Rebellion, the spirit and intent of whom was well represented and made manifest by the "respectable mob" who treated Garrison to a coat of tar and feathers and nearly murdered him outright to put down the antislavery movement. But when they learned that the question would not down, that it was an "irrepressible conflict," this element joined the Republican party, not to abolish slavery, but in fact to force the same political issue forced upon the colonies by the tyrannical laws of England—in augurate a worse system than chattel slavery. "The times that try men's souls" are upon us once more.

And now, inasmuch as THE TRUTH SEEKER is familiar with "the ways that are dark and tricks that are vain" employed by the ubiquitous trio, the bankers, Uncle Sam, and the clergy, who constitute the chief factors in the great confidence game called government, it is surprising to "We, Us & company" that it should ignore the strongest, and concentrate its fire upon the weakest member of the syndicate, and thus change the issue from a reformation of our robber laws, which would give us industrial and physical liberty, to a demand for "mental freedom," thus "putting de cart befo' de anemule." In its efforts to extricate itself from the dilemma of assuming an untenable position THE TRUTH SEEKER assumes "that slavery is abolished" and that we have a "civilized world" which is "well out of the grasp of the church." Upon a little reflection, I think the Editor is not serious in his assumptions; he wants to utilize his correspondents as the monkey did the cat's paws. At any rate, neither of his propositions can be maintained for a moment by an appeal to actual facts as they exist to-day. It is true that the slave code is repealed, and chattel slavery abolished; but it was not done until the aforesaid trio discovered there was a cheaper way to secure the results of labor. Under the old regime, the master had to house, feed, clothe, and care for his chattel; but under this perpetual debt system, the laborers are actually compelled to work for nothing, and board, clothe, and furnish shelter for themselves. Civilized world, is it? Where will we go to find even a civilized nation? You can bet your bottom dollar, Eugene, that a civilized nation has never been seen. And if you think the "world is well out of the grasp of the church," you're destined, "my honey," to be left in the lurch. It is high time for all reformers to know that stealing by law is much worse in its results on society than stealing in opposition to law. And as the law-making powers in all nations are constantly robbing Peter by law to pay to Paul, it is quite evident to all who have any idea of equity in their make-up that there is no civilized nation extant. There are a few truly civilized men and women scattered throughout Uncle Sam's broad domain, who do not want something for nothing and are laboring to abolish privileges and distinctions, and establish equal and exact justice to all—make our government what its founders (chief among whom were Paine and Jefferson) intended it should be, a civilized nation of freemen. Now, this noble band enjoy "mental freedom," they are not "held back by religion, Christianity, or the church." But they are held back and hampered in every conceivable way by the money-mongers. It is almost impossible to get the true reformatory issue embodied in the platform, at any county, state, or national convention. The ubiquitous usurer, and his sycophants and ward heelers, are sure to be on hand with some gag, or bone of contention, to prevent its adoption.

In our present transition state, when the human animal is evolving out of old ideas of law, government, morality, and religion, it is not "well-read men" that are needed so much as civilized men—those who love the truth as well as seek it; and can lay aside all prejudice, partisan spirit, and compare what they read with their experience and observation and know if they are reading the truth. Priestcraft and churchmen form simply an adjunct to our present system of robbery by so-called law, and are just as necessary to keep the people in subjection while the state and usurers rob them, as the military and police. Reform our financial system (legal-tender law), issue money that shall represent the expenses of the government instead of a gift to the banker. Such reformation will bring physical and industrial freedom to the producers and wage-workers and "mental freedom" will follow as naturally as the night follows the day. Au revoir, C. DUTTON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Lake Sunapee.

Once more, my muse! from rest of many a year,
Come forth again and sing, as oft of yore:
Now lead my step to where the crags appear
In silent grandeur, by the rugged shore
That skirts the margin of thy waters free,
Lake of my mountain home, loved Sunapee!

Meet invocation to the pregnant scene
Where, long ere yet the white mau's foot did roam,
Strode wild and free the daring Algoquin;
And where, perchance, the stately Metacom
Inspired his braves with that poetic strain
Which cheered the Wampanoags, but cheered in vain.

Clear mountain mirror! who can tell but thou
Hast borne the red man, in his light canoe,
As fleetly on thy bosom as e'en now
Thou bear'st the paleface o'er thy waters blue?
And who can tell but nature's children then
Were rich and happy as the mass of men?

Sweet granit "Katrine" of this mountain land!
Oh, jewel set amid a scene so fair!
Kearsarge, Ascutney, rise on either hand,
While Grantham watches with a lover's care,
And our dark "Ben" to Croydon sends in glee
A greeting o'er thy silvery breast, Lake Sunapee!

How grand, upon a moonlit eve, to glide
Upon thy waters, 'twixt the mountains high,
And gaze, within thy azure crystal tide,
On trembling shadows of the earth and sky;
While all is silent save when trusty oar
Awakes an echo from thy slumbering shore.

Oh, lovely lake, I would commune with thee!
For in thy presence naught of ill is found;
That cares which wed the weary world to me
May cease to harass with their carking round.
And I while 'midst Nature's grandeur stand,
On mount of rapture 'twixt the sea and land.

Thy past is curtailed by as deep a veil
As shroud the secrets which we may not reach;
And then, 'twixt wisdom, when our quest doth fail,

To read the lesson which thou now dost teach;
And in thy face, on which we look to-day,
See hopes to cheer us on our onward way.

Roll on, sweet lake! and if perchance thy form Laves less of earth than floods of Western fame;

Yet still we love thee, in the calm or storm,
And call thee ours by many a kindly name.
No patriot heart but loves the scenes that come
O'er memory's sea to breathe a tale of "home."

And when the winter in its frozen thrall
Binds up thy locks in braids of icy wreath,
Forget we not thy cherished name to call,
In fitting shadow of the sleep of death!
When golden rays shall o'er our rest still flee,
As morning beams salute thy brow, sweet Sunapee!

*"Ben," Gaelic for mountain.

Sunapee, Lake and Village.

You may read and hear descriptions of certain localities, but really you never quite know a place till you see it. Your correspondent was prepared to behold a most romantic and attractive spot up here among the granit hills, but the charms and beauty of this locality more than meet anticipation.

Sunapee is twelve hundred feet above sea level—too near the stars for cholera—and the air is deliciously cool and fragrant with many woody odors, while bird-notes wild trill and echo far and near. The lake, bearing the same name, is a miracle of loveliness, seeming almost a twin to Loch Katrine in Scotland, so closely does it resemble that famous sheet of water. Three handsome steamers ply over the ten-mile reach of rippling, dimpling wavelets, that seem to be laughing and dancing in the glancing sunbeams, while the rugged hills and stretches of intervals loom, lessen, and glisten amid blue mists and many-changing lights. Many cottages and little pleasure resorts are dotted here and there amid the tall trees and beside gray rocks that stand in all sorts of fantastic shapes like so many nature-appointed guardians. There are little nooks with here and there a lonely cave, half concealed by underbrush, openings that show quaint lily ponds amid cool, luxuriant shadows, the magnetic odors of whose snow-white, queenly blossoms invite one to the very edge of their moist and spongy bed. The lake is a living poem, throbbing with a thousand realities, awaking responsive measures in the heart of every true nature-lover. It abounds with dainty fishes, very tempting to lovers of the piscatorial art, who hover about the green islets and near the inlets and coves of the charming lake. They find here not only the native trout, perch, pickerel, black bass, and other kinds to the water born, but, through the agency of the fish commission, they get also the rainbow trout from California, transplanted here, the blueback from the Rangely lakes, and the lochleven imported from Scotland. Mr. Perley Bartlett is ever ready to escort the amateur fisherman to the charmed spots in the lake, and cousin James A. Wixon, from New Bedford, was a proud and happy man yesterday when he pulled in a lovely salmon weighing nearly eight pounds, besides other smaller creatures of the finny tribe. To-day he has gone in pursuit of the "better half" of that salmon.

If the lake itself is a most bewitching and enchanting pleasure spot, so charming also is its outlet, the dashing, rolling, rollicking Sugar river, a veritable "laughing water," tumbling joyously along, with many a foamy fall and graceful curve, babbling sweet, unceasing serenades, and merrily showing its power to speed the machinery of almost any manufactory that might be planted on its grassy edges.

The mountains seem ever coaxing one to "come up higher," and the climber can not be disappointed when he reaches the summit. The shaded, fern-bordered roads also extend invitations to forest attractions, where the modest wild flowers bloom and flourish in gay and gallant costumes. Near the babbling brook is found the Flower in the crannied wall.

I pluck you out of the crannies—
Hold you here, root and all, in my hand,
Little flower, but, if I could understand
What you are, root and all, and all in all,
I should know—

well, something more of nature's wonderful mysteries.

There are many different kinds of wild blooms in the bosom of the forest and in the meadows and lowlands, among them the brilliant red lilies and showy cardinal flowers, making the marshes and water edges glow and gleam,

As if some wounded eagle's breast,
Slow throbbing o'er the plain,
Had left its airy path impressed
In drops of scarlet rain.

This wonderful and idyllic region presents strong evidences of the great primeval period when the glacial currents were moving downward to the sea. Here are the immense boulders, such as may be seen around Fall River, delicately poised rocking-stones, and many other curious rock formations to interest the student in geology.

It is said, too, that choice crystals, staurolites, electric stones, garnets, etc., are here for those who choose to seek them.

You have heard, no doubt, of "Blue Mountain park," Austin Corbin's great game preserve, but you did not know it lay in this locality. It does, however, and comprises twenty-six thousand acres, with a mountain, Croydon, three thousand feet above the sea. Here he keeps elk, buffalo, deer, moose, the wild hog, and other strange creatures.

And running wild in the forest are foxes, rabbits, an occasional lynx, and other untamed animals. Last fall a deer was discovered in the wildwood and captured—poor thing—by some wild-eyed hunter. Oh, who would be a deer, to be caught by some pursuing, covetous trapper! Scholars, thinkers, people of wealth and culture, have discovered this fair land of Sunapee, and are appropriating its choice beauty-spots, and no one blames them, for if ever there was an earthly paradise this is certainly one; and the cooling shades, the great, wonderful hills, the restful peace touching all things, would seem to heal all hurts. As Emerson has said:

A woodland walk,
A quest of wilding grapes, a mocking thrush,
A wild rose or rock-loving columbine,
Salve my worst wounds.

The little gem of a town can boast of nine schoolhouses, and, of course, the people must be well educated and intelligent.

The Ben Mere Inn, where your correspondent finds rest and comfort, stands on an elevation overlooking that part of the lake known as Sunapee Harbor. It is kept by Mr. and Mrs. M. P. Courser, whose great pleasure is to entertain their many guests and make them happy and contented.

It is quite certain to me that you will want to view this favored and enchanting spot. My heart went out to all my friends with a wish to have them here when I saw the sun the other morning coming grandly up over the towering hills like a conquering hero, with retinues of pink-paneled soldiers, bearing as it were bright banners and flaming torches, showering a wealth of gold and silver upon the smiling lake, while the birds, enraptured with the scene, flung floods of melody in generous measure upon the scented atmosphere, royally welcoming the dawning of a new day.

Among the guests at the inn, and my neighbor at the table, is William Dean Howells, the author. Mr. Howells is as genial and companionable as are his well-known books; and although enjoying a vacation, he still writes a little every day. He is accompanied by his wife and lovely daughter.

Next week there will be more about Sunapee. Until then, and always after, remember me as your friend.

Correspondence.

ANAHEIM, CAL., July 20, 1893.

DEAR LIBERAL FRIEND: This is my first letter to the Corner. I would like a correspondence. I am twelve years old and in the seventh grade. My brothers are running a hay press. The country is full of sugar beets. They are going to have a sugar factory here next year. I worked for six weeks on the beets this year. This is the first year they have raised beets here. They are going to send their beets to Cheno this year. My father gave me a horse, saddle, and bridle, and says when I am twenty-one he will give me twenty acres of land. I do not go to Sunday-school very much, because I live so far from church. I live about three miles south of Anaheim. I had a nice Fourth of July. We had a celebration at Santa Ana. I enjoyed myself finely riding in the swing and treating the girls to ice-cream and candy. I do not take THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I would like to, because I like to read the children's letters. I very often go over to Mr. Martin's and read it. They are our neighbors.

I am going camping on the beach next week. I think I will stay a month. I would like to correspond with some Liberal. As this is my first letter I will close, hoping to see this in print, and try to do better next time.

Your friend, ALLEN WHEATON.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., July 27, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I was very glad to see my first letter in print. This time I will write about Port Townsend. This city is situated in the northwestern part of Washington, on a fine harbor at the point where Puget sound unites with the Strait of Juan de Fuca, and is about ninety miles from the Pacific ocean. The chief business section is built on a beach; the schools and most of the private dwellings are on a bluff, overlooking Port Townsend bay. This city is called the Key City, because it is the port of entry for the customs district of Puget sound. The resources are iron ore and limestone, forests of pine, spruce, and fir, and a large variety of fish. On clear days we can see the Olympic mountains, Mt. Baker and Mt. Rainier, with their tops covered with snow.

The Indians make their living by digging clams, making rugs, and fishing; they also row their canoes from one place to another selling their goods. On the beach in summer the boys and girls go in wading, dig clams, hunt for seashells, and row their boats.

At the present time the government is building a quarantine station on Diamond point, and will soon build a new marine hospital.

We have vacation now for two months, and I expect to go out camping, but instead of a tent we will have a log cabin; and this log cabin will be twenty miles from Port Townsend in the center of the forests, where we can pick all the wild blackberries we want.

I was very glad to see the Connecticut blue laws in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I have been looking for them for over a year, and I could not find them.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone
—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Moham-

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it:
"This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 80 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment;
Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer.
Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Licentiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Absolution; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attitude at Continence even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism
In paper, 25 cents.

HAND-BOOK

OF

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price,

THE RELIGION OF THE BRAIN, and Other Essays. By Henry Smith. London: Watts & Co. Cloth, pp. 88, price $1.

This is a readable going-over of a thousand such subjects as religion, the brain, veneration, love, Jesus, enthusiasm, formalism, the nature of mind, prevention of imperfect persons from marrying and breeding, natural selection, the religion of humanity, the Religion of the Brain that science gives, gravity, heat, matter, electricity, life, phrenology, mesmerism, clairvoyance, thought-reading, thought-transference, insanity, instinct, cause, first cause, design, a future life, the priest, science's function in the future, metaphysical necessity, and so on and on. All these matters, which enter into the musings of the Freethinker, are touched in this work's small compass.

A CONCISE HISTORY OF RELIGION. By F. J. Gould, author of "Stepping-Stones to Agnosticism," "The Agnostic Island," etc. Vol. I. Comprising Sketches of the Chief Religions of the World, with the exception of Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. London: issued for the Rationalist Press Committee by Watts & Co. Cloth, pp. 154, price $1.

This is a work to which special attention must be called above other works. Vol. I. has been issued; and if the author is encouraged by the Rationalist Press Committee of England, under whose auspices he has produced the present volume, he will bring forth a further part or parts. In his first volume Mr. Gould exhibits the origin of religion, the primitive worshipers such as those of stones, fire, sun, moon, earth, etc., the religions of China, India, Egypt, etc., and in short about all the religions of the world except Judaism, Christianity, and Mohammedanism. The volumes that are to follow will, he says, "deal on the same general plan of analysis and history with the composition of the Bible, the evolution of Judaism, the rise of Christianity, the fortunes of the Christian church, and the growth of modern Rationalism." Scattered through the first volume we may note, he says, "not a few indications of the purely human origin of Christianity. These will be expanded and added to." The author says: "I have taken occasion to point out, in passing, a number of parallels between features of Christianity and certain phenomena in other creeds; and in the next volume these correspondences will be insisted upon at greater length."

This work will fill an important need. It is complete, as it deals not with a few religions but with about all. It is concise and handy in form, the present volume covering but 154 pages. It is exact, the author being a gentleman of accomplished scholarship, and scrupulous patience and diligence in his labors. And it is up to the time, embracing the latest discoveries and theories. We recommend our readers to procure the present volume without awaiting its successor or successors. It is worth the purchase.

To show the extent of the subjects treated with condensation yet satisfactorily in this one volume, we will exhibit the table of contents: Preliminary Sketch of the Origin and Development of Religion; Prehistoric Man; Are there Races Devoid of Religion? Animism; Belief in the Soul; Funeral Customs: The Spirit World; Evil Spirits; Sorcery; Worship of Ancestral Spirits; Fetishism and Idolatry; Stone Worship; Animal Worship; Totemism; Serpent Worship; Phallic Worship; Plant Worship; The "Golden Bough"; Fire Worship; Sun Worship; Moon Worship; Earth Worship; Water Worship; Nature Worship; Man Worship; Polytheism; Henotheism; Monotheism; Dualism; Mythology; Priests and Priesthoods; Religious Statistics; American Religions; Religion of the Finns; Religions of China; Religion of Egypt: The Semites; Religion of Primitiv Arabia; Religion of Accad, Babylonia, and Assyria; Religions of Canaan, Phoenicia, Phrygia; The Aryans; Religions of India; Buddhism; Jainism; Sikhism; Shinto, the oldest religion of Japan; Mazdeism (Zoroastrianism, Parseeism); Religion of the Wends or Letto-Slavs; Teutonic Religion; Celtic Religion; Greek Religion; Roman Religion; Notes; List of Books; Index.

ASLEEP AND AWAKE. By Raymond Russell. Chicago: Chas. A. Kerr & Co. Cloth, pp. 200, price $1.

This is a novel written from a Freethought viewpoint. The heroin utters Antichristian sentiments. The hero, and others, touch on a number of those questions meditated by radicals—the equality of the sexes, the marriage formality, etc.

Regarding the literary quality of the book, we will say that its merit is satisfactory. The novel would be classified, in the phrases of the technical critic, as belonging to the metaphysical and introspective school, and to the ideal school. To the metaphysical and introspective, because it devotes much space to analysis of character, to minute scrutiny of the inmost workings of the human soul. And it belongs to the ideal school, because its personages and tone are above the ordinary plane of crude humanity, of an elevation that is styled the ideal. In saying this, we have to imply that the work lacks in the merits of the opposit schools—the naturalistic, realistic, etc. Its picture of life is not of that photographic naturalness which characterizes the latter class. It could not possess the merits of both schools at once. It is, on the whole, interesting and ennobling.

The words of the title, "Asleep and Awake," have a piercing significance. The soul of the heroin is found asleep. We cannot sleep always. This soul has to be awakened. It is momentous whether its awakening be to a life fulfilling happy dreams or revealing a world which can never correspond to their brightness. The awakening is effected by the girl's lover, who finding her a country lass of knowledgeable head but noble heart, reflects that as she must some time confront the problem of life it is best that she do so under favorable and protecting circumstances that he can provide. He has her educated, and carried through deep readings of the most opposit thinkers. Here she learns many lamentable things of the selfishness and cruelty of at least a part of the race. Her further awakening is brought about chiefly by her own action. She plunges into life itself. Here she meets horrible aspects of human nature which surpass what she had beheld in books. After escaping a theatrical manager to whom she has applied for employment, and who besides desiring her to mingle with male audiences and sell liquors insults her with his own libidinousness, she grows giddy and helpless in the street. She is pitied by a passing prostitute, taken to a brothel, nursed through a fever, and on convalescence told that she may depart unharmed. The harlot tells her that she must discard, as misleading and injurious, her trust in human goodness. She replies that there is at least one true and lofty soul, and exposes the photograph of her lover. In an exciting scene the harlot proclaims that very person her ruin. In an ensuing conversation the fallen woman delivers this harangue:

"Do you know, child, there is nothing so helpless, so hopeless in all the world as a girl with nothing but noble aspirations and a fair face? If a woman has great gifts, not simply accomplishments, but genius, she may compel the world to her feet. If she has money, she may then sway society. If she has friends, they may do much to smooth her way, but without genius, without money and without friends, what is there for her in life? I have told you that marriage is a mockery, an idle farce, and that love is a lie. In my turn I say to you, come. In this life there is at least ease and comfort, and you can teach yourself to forget all that you have ever hoped and dreamed. I tell you it is possible to forget, and in this life of ease there are some pleasures for the senses. I like good wine, good theaters and the society of clever men. The society of men of wit and learning is very delightful sometimes. Remember that women like me keep company with the brightest minds, men of letters, men of science, ministers, doctors, lawyers, judges and high official dignitaries—men whose society we could not hope to enjoy were we what society calls virtuous women. This is Custom House place. You have never heard of it, but it has a wide reputation among the male citizens of Chicago. Why don't the authorities suppress it? Ha, ha! It is the creature of the authorities. It is nourished under the wing of authority. The authorities are among its best clients. Your city fathers will not let women sit in counsel with them, even upon educational matters, because they say that home is the place for women. I tell you that word home is used as a cloak for all that is most damnably selfish, brutish and base in human nature, as well as a shrine for all that is called most sacred. When you hear a man saying that home is the place for woman, rest assured that underlying all his fine speeches about the sanctity of the home, there is nothing more nor less than a desire to keep her where she can best minister to him—to his physical comfort, and to his various appetites and passions. Oh! yes, your city fathers who clamor about the sanctity of the home being violated by women sitting on the board of education, are among our patrons. . . . And these creatures put on judge's ermin and priest's robes over their hog bristles, and preach virtue and call upon women to remain at home and guard its sacred portals. No wonder they don't want their wives investigating far beyond their own thresholds. No, no, it would overturn the established order of things to have the women meddling with the creatures of authority."

The further vicissitudes of the characters of this story we find we have no room left to describe. The tale abounds with situations whose strikingness will always be remembered, and with reflections of a weight that will make them chief building-stones of the reader's edifice of philosophy.

The Fowler & Wells Co. have published "Jernshy in Brooklyn," a dialect narrative of a visit of a country aunt to the city. Price, 25 cents.

A novel by Mrs. M. A. Freeman, entitled "Daughters of Cain," has been published by Donohue, Henneberry & Co., of Chicago, at 50 cents.

If the representatives at the Parliament of Religions to be held at Chicago during the Fair would each speak out directly and clearly, their utterances taken together would suggest a number of truths as to religion. Daniel K. Tenney supposes them doing this. In a pamphlet entitled "The World's Parliament of Religions," he has them all saying things that are pointed, and shed quite a light on many phases of religion. He has thus engaged Mr. Idolator, Mr. Israel, Mr. Elect, Mr. Keehoty, Mr. Sawlog, Mr. Statechurch, Mr. Origin, Mr. Muchwife the Mohammedan, Mr. Urim Thummim the Mormon, Mr. Wungod the Unitarian, Mr. Lung the joss-worshiper, etc. The price of the book is 10 cents.

"All in a Nutshell" is the title of an 80-page pamphlet by Asa Auger, Middleboro, Mass. In it he gives a condensation of the fundamental arguments against Christianity. He touches successively on Christ, The Fall of Man, the Christian Dogma of Salvation, The Origin of Christianity, Christianity Borrowed from Paganism; declares that Christians are Polytheists, that God Is Not Omnipotent, God Is Not Immutable, God Is Not Omniscient, God Is Not Omnipresent, God Is the Author of All Evils, God Is Identical With the Devil, God Tempts Man, God Is Cruel to Children, Intemperance Is Taught in the Bible, The Bible Is a Book of Contradictions, Polygamy Is Upheld by the Bible, The Bible is an Obscene and Immoral Book. Then the author handles the Witches, Wizards, Ghosts, Goblins, Devils, etc., of the Bible, and apparently unharmed by the evil arts of these characters lays down roundly that The Laws of Nature Are Broken in the Bible. Next he lays Nonsensical and Laughable Passages of the Bible before an unfeeling world. That Woman Is Degraded by the Bible is his next declaration, and that God Commanded Human Sacrifices the next. Then we have such chapter titles as Fiendish Laws, God's Partiality, Jealousy, Hatred, Revengefulness Toward Man, Slavery Upheld, Lying and Dishonesty Upheld, Robbery Commanded, Did Mr. J. Christ Love His Enemies? Jesus a Bruiser, Christ Taught Moroseness, Hatred to Kindred Enjoined by Jesus, Christ Taught Thoughtlessness and Vagrancy, Jesus's Sacred Promises, What Christianity Brought, Hell, Prayers, What Christianity Has Done for Humanity, What Christianity Is Doing for Humanity, What Christianity Will Not Do for Humanity, God Shattered to Pieces, Godly People, and Has Man a Soul? From the above it will be seen that the book would make a very good little missionary work. We ought to add, we suppose, that it contains some little things that some would call coarsenesses of taste, and also some offenses against correctness of speech. Its price is 25 cents, $1 for five copies.

Gems of Thought.

I WOULD rather believe that man has risen from the ape than fallen from the angel.—O. W. Holmes.

Not to commit any sin, to do good, and to purify one's mind, that is the teaching of the awakened. Not to blame, not to strike, to live restrained under the law, to be moderate in eating, and to dwell on the highest thoughts, this is the teaching of the awakened.—Buddhist Sacred Literature.

He who is thoughtful, blameless, dwells alone, does his duties, is free from desires, has attained the highest end—him I call indeed a Brahmana.—Ibid.

He who is tolerant with the intolerant, mild with the faultfinders, free from passions among the passionate—him I call indeed a Brahmana.—Ibid.

If organic or living bodies manifest properties differing from those of the inorganic, it is not from the working of a special force present within them, but only from the peculiarity of their chemical composition, which makes the effect appear as a transitory manifestation of universal matter. Vital force is therefore no principle, but, as remarked heretofore, a result. When an organic compound appropriates and assimilates inorganic matter that exists in its proximity, it does not do so by virtue of a special power, but only by a process of contagion, whereby it transmits to the other molecular arrangements of its own particles of matter, just in the same way as in the inorganic world energies are transmitted from particle to particle. In this way the genesis of the whole organic world from one or more beginnings, however small, may easily be explained, without resorting to the notion of vital force.—Büchner.

We like to read that which favors our side of a question. The Republican subscribes for a Republican newspaper, and the Democrat reads the organ of his party. In the last political campaign it was no doubt true that advocates of free trade or of tariff reform, and advocates of protection, read for the most part literature favorable to their respective views. The churches plead for greater consensus of opinion, yet the Methodist subscribes for a Methodist paper, the Baptist for a Baptist paper, the Roman Catholic for a Catholic paper. In general we read the organ of our own sect or party. There are, of course, some valid economic reasons for so doing. I shall speak of these reasons below. But, if truth alone were sought, the plan we pursue would be the worst plan possible. Sometimes even we indignantly refuse mental food that might serve as a correctiv of our possible one-sidedness, instinctively avoiding that which we feel cannot be assimilated without a dangerous readjustment of our mental possessions. The skeptic in religion opens a book on Christian evidences, only to close it in haste when he perceives its trend; while the pious believer, who picks up the work of Strauss or Renan, drops it like a burning coal. We avoid books, men, sermons, society, that are not, as we say, congenial. Hence the trouble we have in getting our books read by the very people for whom they were written, or in getting our articles printed in the journals that circulate among the readers we desire to reach. The preacher prepares a vigorous sermon for "sinners," but he preaches it to his own devout people; the "sinners" are not there. Our psychological law of prejudice thus developed teaches us that, since we seek not for what may correct our possible errors, but for what will confirm our already acquired opinions, our mental life always tends toward intensification or involution. Evidently this tendency of the mind toward involution will grow with age, and our every-day experience confirms this deduction. Teaching new tricks to old dogs is easier than giving us new apperceptive organs when middle life is past. The old man changes his politics rarely, his religion never. He lives from within. The mind becomes more and more a microcosm. The cerebral tracts show well-beaten paths of association. The brain becomes hardened and fixed. "An old man," says Dr. Holmes, "who shrinks into himself, falls into ways which become as positive and as much beyond the reach of outside influences as if they were governed by clock-work." The older we get the larger becomes the subjective factor of knowledge and the smaller the objective. We are, as said the obscure sage of Ephesus, like those asleep, withdrawn each into a private world of his own. We can now understand that state of mind described by the word "confirmed." We hear of a confirmed pessimist, a confirmed protectionist, or free-trader. Sometimes we apply the word without shame to ourselves, saying that experience has confirmed us in this or that opinion.—Professor Patrick on The Psychology of Prejudice.

Is a physician of a wide and extensive practice, and his remedies are of the best. The Doctor treats all those peculiar diseases of young and middle-aged men, as the result of youthful errors and excesses, causing Early Decay, Loss of Manhood, Wasting Discharges, Varicocele, Mental and Physical Debility, Idiocy, Insanity, and Death.

To those afflicted and who are desirous of being cured a booklet of some 38 pages will be sent to their address for ten cents, sealed in a plain envelope, giving causes and Symptoms of the Complaint and a description of the Doctor's important medical discovery—an Outward Application—a positive cure—the only remedy of the kind in existence—with evidences of success.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

THE DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND:

An attempt to show that all Organic Beings are both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments.

By JAMES B. ALEXANDER.

Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,067 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages.
Price, express prepaid by us, only $2.75.

This work endeavors to embrace the field covered by thousands of books, such as those of the "Humboldt Library of Science," the "International Scientific Series," etc., by bringing together, in simple and direct form, with proper correspondence between them, all of the known factors contributing toward the origin and evolution of organic beings.

Do you wish to be well informed? THEN READ A CHAPTER OR VERSE DAILY FROM THIS BIBLE OF SCIENCE!

It is entertaining as well as enlightening, and will lead you to "worth-ship" (worship) nature — i. e., appreciate the worth of the Universal Mother.

You must own this book some day: why not NOW?

MEDICAL.

If you need a medicine pay attention to something which will cure you. It is known as

The Water of Life,

and is adapted to curing, more especially, all forms of Stomach, Liver, Kidney, and Bladder troubles. By injecting this water it will heal all sorts of inflammations of the internal organs, such cases as Piles, Typhoid and other fevers, Bowel diseases, Uterine and other forms of Female Complaints. It is a Blood Purifier, and is an excellent remedy for Catarrh and Lung and Throat inflammations. It will heal the nerves, restoring lost vigor of mind and body, creating a good appetite and producing sound sleep. It acts steadily upon the urine, cleansing the blood by means of the kidneys, and acts mildly upon the bowels, thereby producing bodily habits which are so essential to good health. This

News of the Week.

OWING to a quarrel between two rival priests and their factions at the Holy Rosary church, Baltimore, fights have prevailed at late meetings which have required large forces of police for their suppression.

AN important invention just made by the medical profession is that of illuminating the body from within by electricity. By holding an electric lamp in the mouth, or swallowing it, a light is thrown through the frame which enables the physician to locate the morbid spot.

THE pilgrimage of Mohammedans to Mecca has been extraordinarily large this year, the total number of pilgrims already being about double that of last year. Over forty thousand have passed through Suez alone, and it is estimated an equal number have arrived at Mecca by overland caravans. The usual resultant conditions of the pilgrim season favorable to epidemics have been consequently aggravated, and cholera has been exceptionally destructive.

THE parents of six-year-old Johnny Conney, of Fitchburg, Mass., consulted Rev. Father O'Connor, of the Catholic church at Roxbury, as to Johnny's hip disease. Under the priest's advice they obtained some water from the miraculous grotto at Lourdes, and made a nine days' prayer to Our Lady of Perpetual Help, whose picture is venerated at a shrine in the Roxbury church. The boy, at once became well and laid by his crutches, and his parents testify to a miraculous cure.

RECENTLY the United Presbyterian church endeavored to secure data upon the relative proportion of the sexes in church membership, and its returns show that of a total of 100,548 members, 39,383 are males and 61,165 females. This indicates a percentage of 39.2 for the males and 60.8 for the females, a preponderance of the latter of somewhat less than two to one. The proportion of females is nearly the same in the Congregational denomination. The figures are 175,934 males and 349,163 females, for 1891. The proportion here is also nearly two to one with a little advantage in favor of the males.

AMONG the many cures reported as worked by the wrist-bone of St. Anne de Beaupre at her church in New York city are many fully vouched for by the subjects. John J. Reilly, of 337 East 109th street, had been laid up with rheumatism for months, so that he could not walk without the aid of a crutch and stick. He declared that he had visited the relic three times, and felt perfectly recovered. He presented his crutch and stick to the church, where they were placed among other articles of a similar description. Among the visitors was a man paralyzed in both legs. He loudly called upon the worshippers to witness that he was beginning to walk already. A lady who was crippled in the knee told Father Tetreau that she was perfectly cured.

EVER since last winter, declare those who fear a Populist rebellion in Kansas, the governor and his assistants have been maturing plans to make of the militia an auxiliary force that would blindly obey the commands of the executive, right or wrong. "This," they say, "has been deemed expedient since the commander of the militia last winter refused to obey an order given by Governor Lewelling to remove from Representative Hall the legislature then assembled in accordance with law." These accusers, too, point out as significant the declaration of Attorney-general Little that "men must live, and if the nation adopts a policy by which they are unable to supply themselves and their families with food, these people will have it, and starving men will resort to anything."

THE secret negotiation of the Russian extradition treaty by our Senate still provokes reproaches against the private affirmation of an instrument affecting so vitally the traditional policy of this country and the rights of man. The people of the United States, these protesters say, are sovereign rulers. They are entitled to know the terms of so important a contract with a foreign power before it is finally concluded. It was due to them that they should have been made acquainted with the extraordinary terms of this unparalleled convention before it was concluded. Indeed, the despotic character of the Russian government should have rendered our representatives specially cautious and deterred them from a commitment of such moment, certainly until they could have ascertained the will of their constituents. It should at least have rendered publicity and open discussion in the Senate imperative. The people have a right, say these expostulators, and they have now a new reason to demand that the secret sessions of the Senate for the consideration of treaties be abolished.

HOW TO CONVERT THE USELESS INTO THE USEFUL.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poem by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. H. Land, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

Woman's Building.	Art Palace.	Fisheries Building.
Administration Building.	Manufactures and Liberal	Agricultural Building.
Electrical Building.	Arts Building.	Transportation Building.
Machinery Hall.	Mines and Mining Building.	Horticultural Building.
	Forestry Building.

A visitor to the Fair says of this book—reading it in THE TRUTH SEEKER—that it is charming and to one who has seen the Fair vastly entertaining.

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced a degradation of sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism; the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women; husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Maquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of evil, a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rapid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to laborer unit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Witchcraft in America.

In our last issue we related that the witchcraft superstition had prevailed in our country the same as in the Old World. Its most striking manifestation here, namely that at Salem, Mass., we reserved for treatment in this number.

During the winter of 1691–2 a circle of young girls had been formed who were in the habit of meeting at the house of Mr. Parris in Salem for the purpose of practicing palmistry, and other arts of fortune-telling, and of becoming experts in the wonders of necromancy, magic, and spiritualism. The leaders thereof were Elizabeth Parris, aged nine; Abigail Williams, aged eleven; Ann Putnam, aged twelve; Mary Walcott, seventeen; Mercy Lewis, seventeen; Elizabeth Hubbard, seventeen; Elizabeth Booth, eighteen; Susannah Sheldon, eighteen; Mary Warren, twenty, and Sarah Churchill, twenty. Besides the above-mentioned persons, there were three married women, rather under middle life, who acted with the young folks in the scenes which are to follow—Mrs. Ann Putnam, Mrs. Pope, and Mrs. or Miss Bibber. These people, in the course of the winter, became quite expert in the arts they were learning, and gradually began to display their attainments to the admiration and amazement of beholders. At first, they made no charges against any person, but confined themselves to strange actions, exclamations, and contortions. They would creep into holes, and under benches and chairs, put themselves into odd and unnatural postures, make wild and antic gestures, and utter incoherent and unintelligible sounds. They would be seized with spasms, drop insensible to the floor, or writhe in agony, suffering dreadful tortures, and uttering loud and piercing outcries. The attention of the families in which they held their meetings was called to their extraordinary condition and proceedings, and the whole neighborhood and surrounding country were soon filled with the story of the strange and unaccountable sufferings of “the afflicted girls.” No explanation could be given, and their condition grew worse and worse. Presently the village sages, called in for solemn counsel on the case, gave the decision, very common in those days, that the children were bewitched. The community became excited and alarmed to the highest degree. All other topics were forgotten. The only thing spoken or thought of was the terrible condition of the afflicted children in Mr. Parris's house, or wherever, from time to time, the girls assembled. They were the objects of universal compassion and wonder. The people flocked from all quarters to witness their sufferings, and gaze with awe upon their convulsions. Becoming objects of such notice, they were stimulated to vary and expand the manifestations of the extraordinary influence that was upon them. They extended their operations to public places, and their fits, exclamations, and outcries disturbed the services of prayer-meeting and church. On one occasion, in the midst of a sermon, Abigail Williams noticed that an aged person was present against whom a charge of witchcraft had been sworn out the day before. Accordingly she called out, addressing by name the person about to be prosecuted, “Look where she sits upon the beam, sucking her yellow-bird betwixt her fingers.” Instead of being punished for these silly and fantastic doings, the girls were supposed to be under an irresistible supernatural impulse and were looked on with mingled pity, terror, and awe, and made objects of the greatest attention. Only a few persons disapproved of this policy—the family of Francis Nurse, Peter Cloyse and wife, and Joseph Putnam—and these became marked persons, to their future prejudice. Meanwhile the families of the affected children had applied themselves to fasting and prayer, on which occasions the neighbors, under the guidance of the minister, would assemble, and unite in invocations to God to interpose and deliver them from the dominion and snares of Satan. Finally all the ministers of the neighborhood assembled at the house of Mr. Parris and united in a whole day's solemn religious services and earnest supplications for rescue from the grasp of the great enemy of souls. The children suffered their spasms and frenzies before the eyes of these clergy, who made a formal declaration that the evil one was the cause, and had here commenced his operations with a bolder front and on a broader scale than ever before in this or any other country. This judgment of that class supposed in those days to be supereminent and well-nigh infallible in knowledge, spread a dreadful alarm. Men and women left their fields and houses, their business and labor, to witness the awful unveiling of the demoniac power and behold the workings of Satan himself on the victims of his malevolence.

It must be borne in mind that it was then an established doctrine, in theology and in law, that the devil could not operate on mortals or mortal affairs except through the intermediate agency of human beings who had voluntarily entered into confederacy with him, that is, witches and wizards. So the question now arose on all tongues, “Who are the agents of the devil in afflicting these girls? There must be some among us performing that part—who are they?” Before long the continued pressure on the affected children—the earnest and importunate inquiry, on all sides, “Who is it that is bewitching you?” opened their lips in response, and they began to select and bring forward their victims. One after another they cried out, “Good,” “Osborn,” “Tituba.” Against these persons, on Feb. 29, 1692, warrants were issued. On the 1st of March the two leading magistrates of the neighborhood, men of great note and influence, whose fathers had been among the chief founders of the settlement, and who were assistants—that is, members of the highest legislative and judicial body in the colony, combining with the functions of a senate those of a court of last resort with most comprehensive jurisdiction—John Hathorn and Jonathan Corwin, entered the village in imposing array, escorted by the marshal, constables, and their aids, with all the trappings of their offices; reined up at Nathaniel Ingersoll's corner, and dismounted at his door. The whole population of the neighborhood was gathered on the lawn, or came flocking along the roads. The assemblage proceeded to the meeting-house, amid cries of indignation and abhorrence against the prisoners. In that building, Sarah Good was subjected to an examination from the records of which we here reproduce a few lines:

“Sarah Good, what evil spirit have you familiarity with?—None.

“Have you made no contracts with the devil?—No.

“Why did you hurt these children?—I did not hurt them. I scorn it.

“Who do you employ then to do it?—I employ nobody.

“What creature do you employ then?—No creature: but I am falsely accused.

“Why did you go away muttering from Mr. Parris's house?—I did not mutter, but I thanked him for what he gave my child.

“Have you made no contract with the devil?—No. . . .

“Who do you serve?—God.

“What God do you serve?—The God that made heaven and earth.

“Her answers were in a very wicked, spiteful manner, reflecting against the authority with base and abusive words. It was here said that her husband had said that he was afraid that she either was a witch or would be one very quickly. The worshipful Mr. Hawthorne asked him his reason why he said so of her, whether he had ever seen anything by her. He answered, ‘No, not in this nature; but it was her bad carriage to him: and indeed,’ said he, ‘I may say with tears, that she is an enemy to all good.’

“The above-named children, being all present, positively accused her of hurting of them sundry times within the two months, and also that morning. Sarah Good denied that she had been at their houses in said time or near them, or had done them any hurt. All the above children then present accused her face to face; upon which they were all dreadfully tortured and tormented for a short space of time; and, the affliction and tortures being over, they charged said Sarah Good again that she had then so tortured them, and did it, although she was personally then kept at a considerable distance from them.”

On the fairness and sense which this sanctified and Bible-guided assembly displayed in conducting this trial, we will quote Upham's “History of Salem Witchcraft:”

“It will be noticed that the examination was conducted in the form of questions put by the magistrate, Hathorne, based upon a foregone conclusion of the prisoner's guilt, and expressive of a conviction, all along on his part, that the evidence of ‘the afflicted’ against her amounted to, and was, absolute demonstration. It will also be noticed, that, severe as was the opinion of her husband in reference to her general conduct, he could not be made to say that he had ever noticed anything in her of the nature of witchcraft. . . . In this, and in all cases, it must be remembered that the account comes to us from those who were under the wildest excitement against the prisoners; that no counsel was allowed them; that, if anything was suffered to be said in their defense by others, it has failed to reach us; that the accused persons were wholly unaccustomed to such scenes and exposures, unsuspicious of the perils of a cross-examination, or of an inquisition conducted with a design to entrap and ensnare; and that what they did say was liable to be misunderstood, as well as misrepresented. We cannot hear their story. All we know is from parties prejudiced, to the highest degree, against them. . . . It is undeniable, that there was not, beyond the afflicted girls, a particle of evidence to sustain the charge on which she [Sarah Good] was arraigned; and that, in the worst aspect of her case, she was an object for compassion rather than punishment. Altogether, the proceedings against her, which terminated with her execution, were cruel and shameful to the highest degree.”

Here we find it necessary to defer the remainder of this account to our next issue. We hope that its lesson will not be lost on such supporters of the church as may read it. The witchcraft delusion is a natural accompaniment of religious belief in a dominant stage. Whenever the belief in a devil and his myrmidons fills the mind to a certain extent, attendant notions, such as that this devil and his legions are working mischief to mankind through the agency of members of that race—witches—naturally and inevitably take rise. The clergy have always striven with might and main to keep this belief in the devil and his fiendish train at its highest pitch, and hence we may declare that they would if allowed perpetuate these witchcraft panics and persecutions without end, or until society dissolved under them. The lessened state of the influence of the clergy at present is the only cause that we do not suffer these horrors to-day. A reascend of that influence to its former height would be accompanied by a corresponding revival of these madnesses and miseries in their olden frightfulness.

Why the Rule Applies in One Case and Not in the Other.

In a recent review of a book, we adverted to a difficulty that some reasoners meet in their search as to whether there was a first cause or creator of the universe. These reasoners find presented to them the axiom agreed on by scientists, that every thing or event has a cause. They are told to take this rule up, and go by it, and when a Theist advances his notion of a God who was a first cause tell him that there could have been no first cause, for they have a rule which shows that each thing must have a cause, and so God being a thing must have had a cause, and thus could not have been a first cause.

This suits very well so far, but trouble arises if the Theist argues: If you apply your rule to one thing you must apply it to another. If you apply it to God, you must apply it to the universe. You Materialists claim that the universe is self-existent, without a first cause; but if you will only apply your rule to it, that every thing has a cause, then you must admit that the universe, being a thing, must have a cause; and this cause is what we Theists call God. You must not apply your rule in one case and not in another. You must not apply it to God and then refuse to apply it to the universe.

This seems a poser to some Materialists, or Atheists. There is, however, an answer to it, which clears away the difficulty. This answer is stated by Mr. Wm. Maple with a clearness surpassing, we think, that of any other presenter of it, and his rendering of it we will accordingly give. It is admitted, says Mr. Maple, as it must be, that particular things and events have causes; but in the opinion of that writer the great mistake in the reasoning that gives to the great whole of things a "beginning," lies simply in viewing this totality, this aggregation of all things, as a thing or event.

The reasoning of the world that has resulted in the almost universal belief in a first cause may all be condensed into the following brief syllogism:

Major premis,

Every thing or event has a cause;

Minor premis,

The universe—the totality of things—is a thing or event;

Conclusion,

Therefore, the totality of things had a cause.

But is there fallacy in this argument?

Is the conclusion of the syllogism correct and necessary?

If both of the premises are really true there is, of course, no escaping the full force of the conclusion. It is in such case a true statement beyond question.

And the first premis being admitted, it follows that if there is fault in the argument it lies in the second or minor premis, which declares the totality of things to be a "thing or event."

Now, in order to make a valid argument the words "thing" and "event" must be used in the same sense in both premises—they must represent the same mental conception.

But Mr. Maple asserts that the "totality of things" is not and cannot be a "thing" or "event" in the same sense and meaning that these words necessarily have in the first premis; and that the argument is, therefore, defective and the conclusion worthless.

Mr. Maple proceeds to prove this statement in the following manner:

By the word thing, event, phenomenon, or similar word that might be used in the major premis, is meant a particular thing, as compared with other things; one thing out of more or many; a part, an individual.

The idea of relation and condition, and, hence, of something outside the thing considered, is a part of the very conception on which is based the judgment, "every event or thing has a cause."

This is so evident that the proposition, "every event or thing has a cause," may, without any violence to its meaning, be stated as follows:

Every event or thing is the result of, and exists only because there are, other things or events.

And, therefore, the words "thing" and "event," used in the major premis, mean a part only of the totality of things.

But these words cannot have this meaning in the minor premis.

It requires no argument to prove that the totality of things is not a part of anything.

The whole of things can never be at the same time a part of those things.

Therefore, it is most evident that this argument is fallacious, in that it assumes that the great whole of things is a thing in the same sense in which this word is used in the first premis.

And it is equally evident that the totality of things does not demand a cause, because particular things must have and do have causes.

While as to a God, such a being would not be the totality of events or things, but one single thing, a thing apart from the rest, and the axiom that all particular things have causes would apply to him.

To repeat the whole matter in a few words: We say that God had a cause because all single or particular things have causes, and God is a single or particular thing; but we do not say that the universe had a cause, because the universe is not a single or particular thing.

Or in other words:

We say that God had a cause, because each part is caused by some other part, and God is a part; but we do not say that the universe had a cause, because the universe is not a part.

Another Sunday-closing Fight.

The contest at Chicago about opening the World's Fair in that city is to be reproduced in a small edition in San Francisco. While the managers are seeking subscriptions of money to pay for the necessary buildings for the Midwinter Exposition, the ministers are urging that the gates yet to be built shall not be opened on Sundays. The Presbyterians are the first to give tongue to their opinions. At a meeting of the Presbyterian clergy the subject was broached by Rev. H. H. Rice, of Oakland. He said the time is ripe for action, and in his opinion the first move to prevent the opening of the Fair on Sundays should come from the ministers. The suggestion was approved, and upon Mr. Rice's motion the chairman, Rev. Joseph E. Scott, was authorized to appoint a committee to take such action in the matter as in their judgment would bring about the desired end with the least opposition.

When asked by a reporter, "Do you think there will be much opposition to your project?" Rev. Mr. Scott said: "I think there will be. I think that at least four-fifths of the people of the city, outside of the regular church-goers, will want the Fair open on Sunday. I think, too, that there are many among the directors who want to open it, too. We expect Mr. De Young to be against us, more, however, on account of his stand in the matter of the Chicago Fair than from any personal knowledge of how he stands upon the local question. Another thing we will have to contend with out here which they do not have in Chicago is the peculiar situation of the Midwinter Fair. Jackson Park by itself has but few attractions for the citizens of Chicago. Our park, however, is another matter. Every Sunday, winter and summer, the driveways are crowded with thousands of people. They would go there anyway, Fair or no Fair, and when the Fair is out there I am afraid they will all want to take a look at it during their Sunday outing. The Sunday crowds in the Park I think are counted on by the promoters of the Fair materially to add to its financial success, and so we expect to have a hard time to meet the opposition of so many. The Fair buildings will have to be fenced in, however, and we may be able to have the gates closed."

To the end that this minister and his allies may succeed not only in closing an exhibition, as at Chicago, but in shutting the people from grounds of healthful recreation which they would have used anyway, thousands of prayers will ascend, thousands of grim brows be knit all the grimmer, and thousands of evil hearts spring into fierce action at the thought of others enjoying themselves when it is the desire of those hearts that they shall not.

Religion Is Natural, Not Supernatural.

Sometimes the argument is met with, that man's possession of a soul is demonstrated by his having religious conceptions, which other animals do not have. If religion, it is stated, were a thing springing out of the natural faculties of mind, the animals other than man would possess it also. Man's possession of it, the argument goes on, is plainly the result of a divine bestowal of it upon him, specially marking him, and sealing him to his high destiny.

However, this assertion that religion is a property of man alone is not true. A writer in a late European magazine pays the matter attention. Those who deny the religious sentiment to animals, says this magazinist, deceive themselves. Without doubt this religion is of a very inferior order, but, to be exact, can that of millions of human beings be placed in a very elevated category? Analyze the religious idea, deprived of all its pretenses and accessories, and what do you find? Fear and love, from which come submission and many other sentiments, which, according to the quantity, are mixed with the two principal ingredients. Quatre-fages writes that "the domestic animals are religious, for they obey those who appeal to them with the rod or with sugar." In another place he says: "There is no difference between the negro who adores a dangerous animal and the dog who cringes at his master's feet to obtain pardon for a fault. Animals run to man for protection as the believer to his God."

The sentiment of the mysterious and supernatural is manifested by a number of animals and has been observed with some attention. Herbert Spencer reports some observations on a large mastiff which belonged to one of his friends. The dog, playing with a cane which had been turned over to him, inadvertently struck the ground very hard with one end of it, and naturally the other end struck with force against his mouth. The animal at that unexpected manifestation showed consternation and, suspecting some sorcery, concealed himself. It was with great difficulty that he could be induced to return to his plaything. "His conduct showed very clearly that the cane, so long as it only exhibited traits with which he was familiar, was not considered by him as an active agent; but as soon as he received an injury from it he was led, for the moment, to class it with animate objects, and to consider it as capable of injuring him anew."

Of course, between the religion of a dog and that of Pascal there are differences, but all the forms of transition agree; savage man, as well as the man who believes himself civilized, furnishes innumerable examples of this, and shows that here, as in other matters, the differences are in degree, not in kind. Animals know the sense of the mysterious; they are fetishists; they ascribe life to the lifeless; and what more than this comprises the religion of our contemporaries? Between paganism or the grossest, most primitive polytheism, and the purest Christian religion, says the magazinist whom we are noticing, the distinctions are few and gradual; not at all specific and fundamental. On the other hand, between the rudiments of religion, past and present, and certain sentiments of the higher animals, the differences bear the same character; the source is the same.

The sentiment of religion is a natural error, not a supernatural perception. It is a mistake growing out of the imperfect faculties of the animal, whether the animal be higher or lower, not an insight or intuition superadded from a foreign source.

Religion and Pestilence.

While cholera is attracting the public attention, we believe we can do nothing better than call people's consideration again and again to the fact that religion is responsible for the disease. Dr. Walter Kempner, who went abroad for the state and treasury departments to make an investigation into choleraic cause and contagion, returns pointing out to us that the epidemic is fostered by religious pilgrimages, and that its suppression is hindered by governments whose ear is held by the priest instead of the physician. In Jerusalem the doctor and the other commissioners saw hundreds of Russian pilgrims just arrived from the provinces of Russia where famine and cholera were then prevalent. The pilgrims came through without quarantine examination and were camped or grouped in one building in the suburbs of Jerusalem, living in dirt and adding to the unspeakable filth of the city. At Jerusalem the pilgrims come in contact with travelers from all nations; hence this city becomes a focal point of contagion from any epidemic disease. At Constantinople it was found that quarantine was a name only, vessels being permitted to pass through the Bosphorus from Odessa and other ports on the Black sea without restriction. The medical officer charged with the duty of establishing quarantine restrictions told the commissioners that it was impossible to carry out proper quarantine regulations for two reasons—first, because there was no money to enable him to establish them; and, second, because whenever any sanitary measure is suggested by him the Koran, the sacred book of the Mohammedan religion, must first be consulted, and if the expounders of the Koran find nothing in the book which by their interpretation authorizes the proposed sanitary measure, then it cannot be done. The Koran, he said, comes first, and science afterward. The investigation at this point shows that it was through the routes taken by pilgrims to and from Mecca and other holy cities and the channels through which commerce passes that the cholera traveled from India to Mecca, passing thence northward through Persia to points on the Caspian sea, being especially severe at Teheran, where during the autumn of 1892 the daily deaths from cholera were upward of 1,800. Dr. Kempner says:

"The home of the cholera, as everybody knows, is in India. Every seventh year, when the Mohammedans indulge in their pilgrimage to Mecca, a wave of cholera is started abroad, which reaches over an important part of the world. No doubt their religious pilgrimages are praiseworthy from their moral point of view, but it is rather hard that the rest of the world, even as far off as America, should be made to suffer the effects of them."

"Great Britain holds the key to the situation. If she would restrain the pilgrims from coming across the Suez canal to Mecca, there would be comparatively little danger of a cholera invasion of Europe. But her interests oppose such a solution of the problem. Her supremacy in India is assured only so long as she humors the religious customs of the natives."

Now, we wish not merely to have the reader note the dependence of the present cholera epidemic on religion, but to have him also understand that the cholera epidemics of the past, and the other pestilences, all of which worked dreadful desolation during century after century preceding the rise of modern science, were likewise due to religion. In the fourteenth century the black death swept off twenty-five millions in Europe; half the population of England perished. In the seventeenth century the great plague exterminated a large part of the inhabitants of Christendom. In the eighteenth century an unusually severe pestilence made away with multitudes in southern Europe. Investigators into physical science—into the natural causes of disease—attempted to discover the origin and prevention of these plagues just as scientists actually have discovered them to-day; but the church which then ruled all was jealous that their success would draw popular patronage away from its own trade of dealing in sacred science, and investigating supernatural causes, and it accordingly suppressed by force these would-be benefactors of mankind. These things are told at length in the histories of former times. The ravages of the pestilences are depicted in all their destructiveness and the persecutions of the church in all their cruelty. If people would read these narrations they would, thrilled with horror and indignation, not wonder longer at the vehemence with which we Freethinkers who have read them pursue the church. They would understand our opposition to the institution which bred these miseries, and which if it can ever again rise into equal power will infallibly breed them over again.

The Church and Female Beauty.

A Presbyterian minister of Brooklyn has adopted the device of employing young women as ushers in his church, to draw the young men. In commenting on this, the Sun is led to describe the enmity to woman and woman's charms that characterized the Christian church in the early centuries. We are pleased to have this trait of the early church described to the people at large, for many of them know nothing of it. The church now tries to hide it, as it does all its past delinquencies. The Sun speaks out to tell that in the earlier centuries of Christianity, the fourth and fifth for instance, the church repressed the display of feminine beauty as a sinful provocation. Women were kept apart from men in the houses of worship; they were debarred from holding offices in the church, unless as Sisters of Mercy; they were admonished to conceal their physical charms from the sight of men, and they were compelled to hold their peace in the assemblies of the faithful. So, too, in recent times some preachers have warned them of the danger to their own souls and to the souls of their brethren involved in their instinctive use of their attractions. This action of the church the Sun calls an "insult to womanhood," and a "contemptuous treatment of the greatest blessing heaven has conferred on man." It suits us to find our contemporary characterizing the action in such direct terms of reproach. The denunciation is deserved. This policy of the church toward women was indeed shameful. The beauty of woman is a noble thing, and esteem and admiration of it is commendable. Depreciation of it is wrong-headed and despicable. Beauty is excellent, for one reason, because it is useful. It serves as an indication of merit of body and mind; and by choosing the females who possess it, and shunning those who lack it, men beget children who tend to inherit that merit of body and mind. Freshness of complexion and roundness of form are indexes of physical health and vigor. And those facial features termed beautiful are mainly signs of brightness and amiableness of disposition.

The return of this particular Brooklyn church to the recognition and use of the natural, in the matter of feminine beauty, shows that devotion to the supernatural is, in that district at least, in a process of decline.

We shall print next week a reply to Mr. Wettstein's "Underlying Reality," written by his old friend and opponent J. R. Perry, who is, he says, much amused at Mr. Wettstein's persistent attempt to demolish his own consciousness. Mr. Perry is one of the sturdiest of Spiritualists, as Mr. Wettstein is of Materialists. THE TRUTH SEEKER's broad columns are open equally to both sides of the question, so long as disputants keep their tempers. As for ourselves, we are bent on demolishing priestcraft.

The True American says that it did not, as was recently stated by us, publish as authentic a spurious encyclical of the pope. If this is the case, we express to that journal our sorrow at having wronged it; and with a lessened confidence in the reputedly very accurate New York Sun, on whose authority we made the statement, and a wish that the American Protective Association would be as ardent in removing Bible-reading from the schools as in excluding Catholic ceremonies, will bid the A. P. A. journal farewell. Beyond this denial of publishing a self-evident forgery, the remainder of the True American's editorial is blather.

The Columbian Exposition was open last Sunday, but the attendance was light. Visitors were allowed in all the buildings except the Government, but most of the exhibits were closed. The management of the Fair offered no attraction of any kind, nor were there any services in Festival Hall to induce visitors to come out to the park, and as a result nearly all of the sightseers spent the day in the Plaisance, where the only life in the grounds was apparent. The hope is strong among Exposition officials and employees that this will be the last "open" Sunday, and that soon the Clingman injunction forbidding the closing of the gates on the first day of the week will have been dissolved. The reason of the directors for wanting the Fair closed is that every Sunday they lose about $10,000. They have offered Mr. Clingman, whose injunction stands in the way of closing, a goodly sum of money to withdraw that judicial order. But at Mr. Clingman's other ear stand the proprietors of the private exhibitions on the Midway Plaisance, offering much more money to keep his injunction in force and continue Sunday opening. For the most of the Sunday visitors, repelled from the real exhibits of the Fair by most of them being veiled, resort to the Plaisance, where all is open, and the concessionaires there reap good harvests Sundays. Thus stands this complicated case, and flagrant exhibition of Sabbatarian oppression and injury of the masses.

To Grover Cleveland, President of the United States.

HONORED SIR: I have thought that an open letter to you through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER would not be unacceptable, assuming that you read that most estimable paper; and if not, you ought to. I have a few suggestions to make, which, had they been grouped in your message and brought to the minds of that honorable body, would be of great advantage if wisely considered. As we are about to become a Christian nation, having adopted the old Hebrew tribal God (Jehovah) and our trust in him is recognized and stamped on our coin without the sanction or even the knowledge of the people, our first suggestion is that you in cabinet council instruct our superintendent of the mint or coinage to remove that false dogma, "In God We Trust," from our coin and place it where it properly belongs—if it belongs anywhere in any connection with the nation—and that is, place the same on the flag of the nation instead of on the coin, and have that "trust in God" wave from the mast-head of every vessel in our navy, thus giving the lie to that assertion of Napoleon Bonaparte, "That he had always noticed that the Lord was on the side of the heaviest artillery." My next suggestion is, that on the coin dollar you recommend to be inscribed, "No Trust," and on the half dollar, "Terms Cash," and then to enable these measures to be carried out you recommend that the secretary of the treasury be authorized to issue a sufficient amount of treasury-notes to do it with, for a people despoiled of their circulating medium to so large an extent are forced into debt, which is to be forced into crime. I would further suggest that you deal somewhat with the national banknote (so-called), about midway on the top of which is inscribed these words, "national currency," which is a square lie and is placed there to allure, deceive, and betray a confiding people. The same currency is not national in any sense, but is only a piece of corporation paper, and is only claimed to be "national" by virtue of an unconstitutional law; and if that term "national currency" belongs anywhere, it is on the United States treasury-note, for that is national—made and issued by the nation—and it seems plain that this whole business was only a scheme of cupidity to give a false appearance—that a banknote indorsed by government on the back is good, while a treasury-note made and issued by government on the face is not good, but a "rag baby," which means that the corporation note has a credit superior to the treasury-note. And there is one other consideration I would respectfully suggest—that as the Union army has now been pretty well pensioned, the Salvation Army be gone through with and pensioned also, and especially those that early "girded on the armor" and battled faithfully for "union," which, carried to extreme, is centralization of power—which is monarchy. And my last suggestion is, that as banks deal only in money, the same constituting their stock in trade, you cause to be inscribed prominently on the top of every banknote this motto, "In National Bonds We Trust." And so with these simple measures adopted the nation may survive. Otherwise we shall continue to look for "kingdom come," bonds, interest, power, and gold till the republic shall end.

Dynamicism vs. Agnosticism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your valuable article on "Materialism vs. Idealism," in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 15th, are given some of the points of Professor Huxley's creed that are worth attending to—as is everything that pertains to Huxley, even when we are obliged to differ from him.

It seems impossible to dissent from the proposition that all the knowledge we possess at first-hand and absolutely is the knowledge of our sensations or feelings. These we undeniably feel and therefore know, but the cause that lies behind them we do not feel; we only judge what it is exclusively by means of our feelings. All knowledge of things outside of ourselves or even inside of ourselves, if outside of our sensations and feelings, is got by inference—that is, processes of reasoning. And we know nothing whatever of things outside of ourselves except upon circumstantial evidence. But we are accustomed to regard this evidence as mighty good in a great many cases and have all settled down in the belief that our sensations are caused by things outside of themselves. We have, for example, a disagreeable feeling we call hunger. We know this much absolutely, that we have the feeling and that it is disagreeable; but we do not know what caused it or what will cure it. We believe, however, that we have been hungry before and that we were cured in a certain way. We believe (but do not know absolutely) that we have hands and a mouth and a stomach, and that outside of us there are substances called food—whether spiritual, ideal, or material we do not know; but at any rate we believe we inserted some of it in our mouth and that in a short time the disagreeable feeling of hunger vanished and was succeeded by one of satisfaction. We have another belief—a mighty far-fetched one, a long way from absolute knowledge—that we can repeat this operation and satisfy hunger again. So we proceed to believe that we reach out and get food and swallow it and after a short delay we get through the uncertainties of mere belief, or believe we do, and reach the solid ground of an absolute knowledge in the shape of a sensation of satisfaction. Thus beginning with a positive knowledge in the shape of a sensation of hunger we pass through a series of beliefs, and reach another tract of positive knowledge. So far, we agree with Huxley, Berkeley, Descartes, Fichte, etc., and do not see what reason any materialist can have for dissent. But we must even go further and assert that the sensations we have of our beliefs are not conclusive; in other words, that when we have a feeling that our belief is so and so, it may in reality be quite different. In fact, except by inference we do not know we have beliefs, thoughts, opinions, etc., at all, any more than we know we have fingers or clothes. This is proved by the fact that thoughts are separable from sensations (as I have shown in "Dynamic Theory," page 965) and that beliefs are not of themselves sensations, but as we commonly say and believe, they often, but not always, give rise to them. That is, we have a sensation of having such and such an idea or opinion, but the sensation is all we know absolutely and whether the idea is really behind it and is the cause of it, is inferential for precisely the same reason and in the same way as is the possession of teeth or hair. Now right here is where I am obliged to take issue with Professor Huxley. He says (as you quote), the arguments appear to "show that our certain knowledge does not extend beyond our states of consciousness." . . . "But, if this is true our one certainty is the existence of the mental world," etc. Not at all; if this is true, we have no certainty whatever of the existence of the mental world any more than we have of the physical. The only certainty in the case would be the feeling or sensation, it might be of heat or cold or red or sound or pain or pressure; but how do these establish the certainty of a mental world as distinguished from a physical one? They do not do it at all, except upon the assumption that they themselves (the sensations) are mental, and this assumption is always made by the metaphysicians. But it is as plain as day that in this they beg the entire question. They slip right off from their own fundamental proposition, that sensations are all we know, and proceed to assume to know that sensations are not physical.

When we follow the common use and call them mental it is with the reservation and understanding that the mental is only a subdivision of the physical. And so we affirm that sensations are physical, even though by way of distinction they be called mental.

Now, neither an assumption on one hand nor an affirmation on the other amounts to anything without proof. And according to the proposition agreed to at the start, the only sort of proofs possible are circumstantial and inferential, the direct original sensations themselves not by any possibility settling the question or even indicating any question to be settled. And now an important preliminary to be determined is what we mean by physical. The term is applied first to substances or things, collectively called matter, and second to the motions of these things. We observe that bodies are sometimes at rest (or comparatively so), and sometimes in motion, and that when the motion of any one begins or is accelerated it is the result or sequel of an impact from another body in motion that simultaneously loses as much motion as the first one gains. That is, body No. 1 at rest happening in the way of body No. 2 in motion, No. 1 "resists" the motion of No. 2 and reduces it, while No. 2 disturbs the rest of No. 1 and sets No. 1 in motion. In view of the foregoing, I define a physical body to be one that is competent to resist, reduce, and acquire to itself the motion of another body, or to lose such motion to a third body by an impact against it. Now, what proofs have we that such bodies exist? In the Morse system of telegraphy the letters of the alphabet are formed by dots and dashes separated by spaces, and it is obvious that the spaces are just as essential as the dots and dashes. In fact, but for the spaces the dots and dashes could not exist as such but would form a continuous line.

When an operator receives a message in the usual way by the ear, each dot or dash is represented to his ear as a sensation of sound, and each space represents a pause in time, during which he has no sensation, but of which he has just as full a certainty as he has of the positive sensations that denote the dots and dashes. But again, the sensation of the dash is different from that of the dot quite positively, and yet only as regards its duration. So here we have either as original sensations or as the very earliest of perceptions, a knowledge of space as a blank destitute of sensation, or space filled in to constitute an extension and giving a sensation of continuity and contiguity, and a knowledge of time either as a blank pause without sensation or as a continuous, extended, unbroken sensation.

(The measurement of spaces and intervals of time are probably accomplished by the active sensations of other things occupying such spaces, and we get no idea of times during which sensory impressions cease to be received, as in sleep, hypnotism, paralysis of sensation, etc.)

Without the sense of times and spaces, duration and extension, it is obvious that no adequate conceptions could be formed of anything, and all our sensations would be so many detached impressions, disconnected, and therefore meaningless. But all our positive sensations are separated and connected by these negative ones, until all together they affect our sensorium as if a complete picture of something were printed on it. We do not at first know that this picture is due to something outside of ourselves. But this conviction comes to everyone by the mutual limitations, corrections, and reinforcements the sensations put upon one another. Thus the sense of sight alone does not convey an idea that the object seen is at a distance—it may be in the brain itself, for all we know, and in dreams in a certain sense it is. But other senses, as that of touch, interfere to modify that of sight, and convey to us a sense of the object seen being at a distance, the identity of the two becoming a matter of sensation also, by the perception of the same qualities in the object by different senses or different methods of the same sense.

It seems hardly necessary to go any further in this direction, or to seriously controvert philosophers who write books for people and deliver addresses to audiences of the existence of which outside of their consciousness they say they have no certain evidence, and who, if they do exist, are likewise instructed that the books, the people, and the philosopher who is supposed to address them, are possibly but the figments of their own baseless fancy.

If we begin at consciousness and trace backward the causes that lie behind it, we come to the external world. This is the method of the idealist or spiritual school, and, having assumed consciousness to be spiritual, it is not strange that as each cause, one behind the other, came into view they would all appear spiritual to them. The materialist, on the other hand, beginning in the physical world and passing from one physical cause to another, finally reaches consciousness. So his conclusion is that everything, including consciousness, is physical. The point of agreement between these two is significant. They practically agree that there is but one nature and one system of causes covering both consciousness and the world external to it. One says the external world must be spiritual to have produced spirit, the other says consciousness must be physical, to be connected with and influenced by physical causes. Now one or the other of these parties must be right. The third assumption, that there may be both spiritual and physical existence and causation acting together and influencing each other, is out of the question, for the simple reason that nothing can act upon a physical body, or be acted on by one, unless it possesses resistance, and, as defined above, such a body is physical. All the bodies we get any sensation from or idea of come under the head of physical bodies because they possess resistance, and whenever they move their motion can be shown to be the sequel of the motion of some other body.

The chemists inform us that there are seventy-three elements or distinct bodies which they are unable to reduce to simpler forms and from which all other bodies are compounded. There is another body, however, discovered by the physicists and admitted by all natural philosophers to exist, although never seen by any of them, and that substance is called ether. It occupies all space and fills the pores and spaces between the molecules of solid and fluid bodies. Every motion of every body communicates motion to the ether in and around it, and by reason of the elasticity of ether this motion is transferred across and through it in all directions. The agitation of this ether by the activity of the materials in the sun, in a star, in a lamp, or even in a burning match is communicated from particle to particle by an undulatory or waving motion till it finally reaches our eye, is thence propagated to the brain and there sets up one or more of the sensations of color, as red, yellow, green, blue, etc., or all of them at once, giving the compound sensation of white. Now it is essential to distinguish between the ether and its motions. While the ether is still, as in a dark room, we get no sensation; but light a match and instantly the ether is set in motion, and this motion reaching the brain cells is communicated to the material that feels and its motion is feeling. It is a sensation, say, of redness. It is only a particular sort of feeling substance in which the motion called redness can be set up. It appears not to exist in the brains of some color-blind people. What the nature of the substance is we do not know, but that it is competent to be started in motion by ether undulations of a certain length is about as certain as any knowledge we possess; and its motion is feeling. Professor Huxley says in one of his essays that it "gives rise" to a feeling. If motion gives rise to a feeling, the feeling itself is motion; for while motion is transferred from one body to another it is never destroyed—it is always the motion of something. Therefore, no matter how many removes we may place the feeling, redness, away from the motion of sunlight, we are still under the necessity of considering it the motion of something. Furthermore, this feeling substance is a physical body because it complies with the definition in being set in motion by the motion of a physical antecedent; and feeling is a physical motion because it is a term in a series of physical motions. We have the feeling of redness on condition that certain physical motions have preceded it, otherwise we do not have it. It is nothing to the point to say, as Professor Huxley does, that redness is totally unlike any of the phenomena we commonly regard as physical. If our notions of what belong to the physical are too narrow they must be widened to suit the indicated facts. Again, Professor Huxley says that if we should be able to follow the physical chain of the materials up to the last molecule concerned in the sensation we should still be unable to include "the feel of redness within the bounds of physical science." If a man is to be Agnostic, it ought to be on a point like this, that surely nobody knows. But it is precisely of this unsupported assumption that Professor Huxley feels most certain and calls it a plain truth. It is equivalent to saying that even if we could get directly at the feeling substance in the brain, we could not by any possible scientific test get a continuation of the motion constituting the feeling in any form competent to set up feeling in ourselves. For all the tests we have or can have of motion are by its transfer and continuation in some form that can finally become feeling in us.

Thus, if a red object is too distant to be seen with the naked eye we can use a telescope, which concentrates more force upon the eye and so supplies enough energy to vibrate the feeling substance of red sensation. It is hardly safe to say what we could not do with this feeling substance if we could get at it directly, but we can prove that in its normal place in the brain its surroundings are such that its motions are continued on by transfer to other bodies, and it is physical in giving motion as well as in receiving it.

For example, an engineer running a train at a rapid speed suddenly sees a red flag or red lantern in the middle of the track. Instantly a lot of ponderous machinery—muscles, levers, the throttle-valve, the reversing apparatus, the brakes—are put in motion to stop the train. What is the cause of it all? The feeling of redness. If the flag had been white, or if the man were color-blind, so that the red flag could not cause in him a feeling of redness, then with a feeling of whiteness, he would have rushed along in safety, or with no color feeling at all, have plunged into disaster. Thus redness alone, a motion of the feeling substance, is sufficient to disturb a long train of other sensations that finally culminate in a will and muscular activity. It is nothing to the point to say that feeling does not appear at all like other physical motions. Is the motion of a waterfall anything like heat? Is the motion of a dynamo anything like light? These motions all differ only because the things that move differ; and when we understand the physical structure of the moving bodies we generally see why they move in the way they do. If "our posterity" ever get acquainted with the feeling substance of the brain they may possibly be able to see why its motion has that recurrent or self-reflected quality that makes it apperception. At any rate, if we can be sure of anything, we must be sure that sensation is motion like heat and light, and not a thing like gas or ether, and that it is interchangeable with the motions of bodies recognized to be physical.

A Few Pictures Perfectly Painted.

WHEN AN EXCUSE IS EASY.

If we have a thief in our own family we can very often, through pity and sympathy, overlook his crimes, and even go so far as to misjudge the court in his favor. If we have a liar in our own family, we can very often learn to believe many an honest man a liar in order to vindicate that particular one in our own family. Sins in our own families and among our close friends look small; in those of whom we know little they are magnified. The sin of a Christian looks very small to a Christian, while the sin of a Freethinker looks very large in the eyes of a Christian.

An editor who was a Freethinker married in a Christian family. An elder sister of his wife had some years before married a farmer. Farming was apparently too slow, so this gentleman taught school, was a book-agent, moved to the same town where his brother-in-law was editing his newspaper, and there engaged in the sale of organs, pianos, and sewing-machines, still retaining his farm, which was only two miles away. One Sunday the editor and his family were invited to take dinner at the home of the other sister. The wife of the editor proceeded to her sister's home, but the editor did not accompany her. When asked why she was alone, she honestly confessed that her husband, besides editing his own paper, was under contract to write for several other papers and that he was compelled to do some work on Sunday. The parents of the women were also present, and putting their heads together the editor was condemned, hell pictured off, and in fact there was every prospect of family trouble.

Things cooled off some when the gentleman who lived on the other brother-in-law's farm drove up to a post and tied his horse. The ex-farmer brother-in-law greeted him cordially and, after courtesies were exchanged with the ladies, the two men proceeded to the barn. What for? Would this great Christian brother-in-law do anything similar on Sunday to that which he so bitterly opposed in the editor? The folks in the house knew just what was going on in the barn. The matter had previously been discussed. The horse owned by the organ, piano, and sewing-machine brother-in-law was better suited for farming, and the farmer owned a horse which was better adapted to sewing-machine business than to farming. What, then, was going on at the barn? Must I tell you? Why, a horse-trade! And on Sunday! It did not raise a commotion at the house. But when the editor arrived from his office things looked very blue for him, because he had written a two-column article that Sunday morning.

All this proves what I said in the first paragraph of this article. The editor was a Freethinker, and his Sunday work was a crime. The other brother-in-law was a hardshell Lutheran, and he could trade horses on Sunday without the least family jar. Not God alone, but the people, have a right to judge here.

THE DIFFERENCE IN TWO SCIENTIFIC JOURNALS.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is authority in a certain branch of science. The Scientific American is an authority in another branch of science. Both publications are credits to the sciences they represent. About one year ago (June 25, 1892) there appeared in the Scientific American an article, "From Chaos to Man," by Garrett P. Serviss. The illustrations were fine, and all that art and genius could produce. They were taken from the originals in the Urania Scientific Theater at Carnegie Hall. In speaking of the different periods of the earth, after its passage through chaos, the writer says: "The next scene carries us forward millions of years to a time when the crust of the earth had become comparatively stable, and broad continents had appeared above the sea. This is the carboniferous age, when the low, moist lands of the globe were clothed with a wonderful vegetation, forming strange forests, in which plants allied to some of the reeds and the club mosses of to-day attained the size of great trees, such as the Lepidodendra, the Sigillaria, and the Calamites."

Mr. Serviss tells us that it was millions of years after earth appeared from chaos and water to the time of the carboniferous age. The age of glaciers the author approximately fixes at "two hundred and forty thousand years ago, and to have ended forty thousand years ago."

As theological students, with the assistance of the Bible, fix the existence of Adam at about six thousand years, there seems to be by Mr. Serviss's article a big period existing between the formation of the earth and the existence of man; but using the Bible's own language there was only six days—or rather God made the earth on the first day and on the sixth day he made Adam.

Mr. Serviss's article is very able, but it can lead a man to believe nothing more than that the earth was formed, as well as all it contains, by the only true god—nature. No other God is recognized in the article. Although worthy of publication in so great a publication as the Scientific American, I don't see how that journal can escape the slander of Christianity. Surely, as portrayed here by pen and pencil, the world existed millions of years before the Bible's God. Would the verdict of the God-fearing people have been the same had those illustrations and the article appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER? But the aim of the Scientific American was not to antagonize Christianity. It was simply to prove scientific exploits, not even recognizing a God or the Bible.

IN THE COMPANY OF SUPERSTITIOUS PEOPLE.

Two years ago I traveled a distance of four or five miles in a stage-coach, in the anthracite coal regions. Ignorant people are superstitious, and especially certain classes of the foreign element. The coal region of Pennsylvania is the place to find superstition and churches. In this coach were about eight women and two men besides myself. We had just left the town and all the passengers seemed bound for the railroad depot where I was going. One woman began a conversation by stating that the little eight-year-old daughter of the evangelical minister of the town we had just left was to be buried that day. Everybody in the coach expressed regret at her death, and then the woman began to tell a cold and startling story. "Last night," began the woman, "there was not a soul in that minister's parlor, which adjoined the room containing the corpse, and all at once the organ in the parlor began to play 'Nearer My God to Thee.' This was the favorite 'piece' of the dead child." The women and men, and even the driver of that coach, looked at each other in holy horror. They believed that the organ had really begun to play that little girl's favorite "piece" without any human fingers upon the keyboard. I was sitting in one corner of the coach, when the woman who told the story looked at me so sharply for some expression of belief or disbelief, that I sneered in her face. I was then looked upon as some great monster, and as I was walking backward and forward on the platform of the depot waiting for the train I could see little groups of the party talking to each other very confidentially, and by catching a word once in a while I learned that they were wondering who and what I was, just because I was not superstitious enough to believe the organ lie.

RELIGIOUS BIGOTRY IN THE WEST.

A very popular Pennsylvania humorist is at present living in Colorado. In a private letter to me of recent date he says among other things: "I have always heard people boast of the broad and liberal views of Western people—the Western people boast of it themselves. Well, they are not. You will find more religious bigotry here than anywhere else. The biggest 'skirts' are the biggest men in the church. Of course one meets with some good fellows, but they are scarce. Here, in —, there are over a dozen men who have killed from one to ten men. While none of them are church-members, they all believe in the story about Jesus, and expect to repent, when they get too old to hustle for a living, and go straight up to heaven. I have talked to one man who has killed several men, and he believes that we all have a spirit that will live forever, and yet he does not seem to feel alarmed about his future happiness."

A SALVATION ARMY LIAR.

The question has often been asked: "Are the members of the Salvation Army sincere?" As you cannot judge a body by the doings of an individual, it would be vain for me or any other man to attempt to answer the question. One night last winter I stopped for a few moments near the corner of Vine and Eighth streets, in the city of Philadelphia, to listen to a lot of these religious fanatics. A woman in the ring was speaking. I drew nearer, and I suppose besides myself and others in the crowd God heard her say: "Now, in Chicago, where I live," etc., "the Salvation Army has accomplished" so and so. Now, there is not much in that, yet I have seen that very woman "pulled in" by the Williamsport, Pa., police more than once for her violation and defiance of city laws governing the Salvation Army. This woman never lived in Chicago, but was and always has been a resident of Williamsport, where her name can be obtained either at the county jail or police headquarters at any time. She did not want to tell that Philadelphia crowd that she was from a small city of thirty thousand people. Chicago would give her more prestige. She did not expect anyone in that crowd knew her, and that God had other business and would not see or hear her.

SYMPATHY WITH A VENGEANCE.

A little five-year-old boy had been buried, and the friends and relatives of the family had come back to the house. The minister was there also to console and administer spiritual advice to the parents. This is the way he consoled the father: "You may be glad your little boy is in heaven, for had he grown to manhood he might have entertained his father's erratic views about our savior and redeemer Jesus Christ and been lost. You can sing praises to God that your darling is in heaven with him who doeth all things well." If that is Christian consolation, pray give me not of it.

The Doctrine of Peace and Charity.

One of the most difficult things for a radical believer in anything is to imagine himself standing in the shoes of a person who is just as radical in an opposite belief. The result of an argument between two persons who so honestly differ in opinion is generally a violent antagonism that stultifies judgment and paralyzes reason. The conversion of any person to a different form of belief cannot be accomplished by abuse of the believer or by a violent denunciation of the things he believes in. Change in belief to be effectual must be accomplished by dispassionate logic and the presentation of facts in such a manner as to avoid the slightest shadow of anger. The more gentlemanly the method employed to present a fact, the more effectual its work when dispassionately received. The man who has calmly reasoned for himself, and thus been made to change his ideas, can afterward bear to hear his discarded belief ridiculed; but never until then. There is as likely to be intolerance in the ranks of those who call themselves Freethinkers and Liberals as among the churches. As church intolerance and bigotry fans disbelief in religion into an active flame of anger and resistance, so may the Agnostic and Freethinker of whatever shade embitter the Christian follower against Liberalism by too violent denunciation of the church. I confess to have felt like calling many a devout Christian a fool for not seeing things as I did, and the greatest struggle I have before me to-day is to overcome this natural tendency to intolerance. I believe that there are only the seeds of future weakness sown by the violent and aggressive Freethinker. To live and expand, the doctrine of peace must thoroughly impregnate the councils of those who unite in organizations for the spread of Liberal ideas. As every aggressive movement of the Christian church has in reality weakened its influence and lost true followers, Liberals should be warned by the example of their opponents. We may talk about peace and justice, liberty of thought, reason, and charity existent as principles among us, but there are too many who fail to practice them in their intercourse with church-members, and thereby create an antagonism that rises as an impassable barrier against every fact and truth in history and every effort to throw light into the dark byways of superstition.

International Congress of Freethinkers.

The weeks and days are rolling by, and the time of this great Congress is rapidly drawing near. The committee desires to vividly imprint upon the minds of all true friends of our cause the importance of this great event. Some do not seem to fully realize it as yet. They appear to regard it as a merely every-day event, an event of local character and meaning. Some of our friends are of the opinion that its influence can only extend to the locality wherein it may be held, and beyond this they fail to realize the meaning, the weight, and vast importance that will be centered in and around this gathering. Remember this is not a local congress of any one society, it is not a congress of one state or territory, it is not a congress of any one country or one nation. It is a Congress of all nations, of all races, and of all tongues; it is a Congress affecting our cause the world over; it is a Congress whose principles are universal in character; it is a Congress the influence of which must be far-reaching, overstepping the bounds of national ties and purely local feelings of country. At this Congress the principles and the interests of our cause in every part of the globe are to be discussed and declared. It is not only that the eyes of orthodoxy in America will be upon us, but the religious world at large will watch with exceeding great interest the outcome of its deliberations. They will exult in our failure, and frown upon our success. Success to us at this Congress means their speedy and ultimate defeat, but failure at such a time means that the chains of mental bondage shall be tightened just a little more, and the triumph of the aristocracy of the church as against the democracy of the people prolonged in consequence. Again would I impress upon the minds of all this one fact—that we, the Freethinkers of America, have invited the world at large to participate in this Congress with us. We must show them our true generosity and our national hospitality toward them. Great things are naturally expected from us, and it is a consummation devoutly to be wished that the Freethinkers of America will not be found lacking in sympathy or indifferent as to the general results of this Congress. In your name is this Congress being held, under your auspices was it inaugurated. We must now work together for its success. Everything of a nature most vital to the future prospects of the cause of Freethought depends upon it. We want this Congress of the World's Freethinkers—the first of its kind ever held upon our shores—to be a Congress worthy of the United States and the cause of Freethought in general. Many Freethinkers hesitate about subscribing to anything of this kind outside their own locality. They feel that they are not called upon to assist in any undertaking that may be inaugurated or transacted outside their own district. These forget that upon an occasion of this kind the entire forces of our party are affected; every town, every village, and every locality will feel the beneficial influences of our success at this time, and the converse is equally true, for each will feel the disastrous results of failure.

Our cause has a universal prerogative, our concerns are with all mankind without distinction of country or color; and though we claim no absolute right to command or enforce obedience to our demands, still we can assert the right of each to perform their respective duties in this direction, and in asking for your help, your assistance, and your encouragement toward securing the greater and better success of this Congress, I urge again that it is not a privilege we are affording you, but a duty we assign to you and ask you to perform. Thomas Paine said, "Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered, yet we have this consolation with us, the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph." Born of an earnest desire for the right, imbued with a glorious hope for the triumph of our cause, your committee will feel amply rewarded for their labors, their time, their energy, and their enthusiasm if you will only help us to secure the success of this Congress and assist in our triumph over ecclesiastical tyranny. Tyranny of such a character is indeed a hell of itself, which to conquer may not be an easy task, but we can fortify ourselves with truth, and with the light of human reason, buoyed up with human hopes, we may break through the dark and hovering clouds of ignorance, illuminating the pathway of life, showing to men and women, in characters of living light, a higher and a nobler state of human progression. This is the object that the leaders of our cause have had before them in all ages of the world. Our leaders of to-day are actuated by the same motive, the same principles—the same ultimatum being the goal upon which their eyes are fixed, ever luring them on, and whereon all their efforts are directed. The forthcoming Congress should be made the fulcrum, or the turning-point, in the history of our cause. A new era of religious and political freedom should be declared, and the inherent rights of man, woman, and child asserted and set forth. Where in the broad expanse of universal thought could nobler sentiments be found, purer thoughts portrayed upon the canvases of our minds, embodying a nobler cause than ours? Is not this sufficient to secure for us the help and the good wishes of all? Yet, alas, how many remain so indifferent upon such important matters, which affect the whole of mankind to the uttermost recesses of our earth.

Realize then that the Congress is at hand. Roll up your contributions, that they may be too fast for us to record or count them. At this time everything depends upon unity of action by all concerned. If each would give as he or she can afford, a sufficient fund would be immediately placed in the hands of your committee so that success would be certain, a grand and glorious victory could be achieved, and our cause receive such an impetus, that the combined efforts of orthodoxy would utterly fail to check it, even for an instant, in its onward course.

We have already secured the services of several of our best lecturers of both sexes. To add to the glory and success of Woman's Day, there will be present to address the Congress Susan H. Wixon, Voltairine de Cleyre, Mattie P. Kregel, Lillie D. White, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Dr. Juliet Severance; and we are expecting also Mrs. Katie Kehm Smith, secretary of the Oregon State Secular Union. Our lady lecturers will not necessarily be confined to Woman's Day alone, but will also be heard upon other days during the Congress. Do not forget that G. W. Foote and Charles Watts will represent our English friends, both of whom will address the Congress. The other speakers who have already been secured are, Samuel P. Putnam, C. B. Waite, Captain Adams, John R. Charlesworth, T. B. Wakeman, John E. Remsburg, Franklin Steiner, Dr. J. L. York, and others.

'Tis true the prospects are decidedly increasing for the successful termination of the Congress, but the hands of the committee are somewhat cramped for the want of funds. I trust, then, that our friends will realize the necessity of prompt and immediate action, and that each will give what they can as their share toward the general expenses.

Bear in mind that the Congress meets on the 1st day of October. We want all to attend who can conveniently do so; help to swell the crowds that shall congregate in the name of our cause upon this auspicious occasion. By our association we can greatly influence and affect each other. By these means we may tend to increase both the happiness of ourselves and those around us. Here, then, is our duty; here is the allegiance we owe to each other; here lies the ground of our operations, and the object of our future work.

Why Helen Gardener Wrote Her New Book.*

There are at least two sides to every question. Usually there are several times two sides; or at least there are several phases in which the question has a different aspect.

I am led to state these seemingly unnecessary truisms because I have been confronted by hearers or readers who assumed, since I had presented a certain phase or manifestation of heredity in a given article or lecture, that I was intending to argue that a fixed rule of transmission would necessarily follow the line I had then and there drawn.

* Preface to "Facts and Fictions of Life," a new book, by Helen H. Gardener. Price, cloth $1, paper 50 cents.

Nothing could be farther from my idea of the workings of the law of heredity.

Nothing could be more absurdly inadequate to the solution and comprehension of a great basic principle.

Again, an auditor or critic remarks that, "We must not forget that we also get our heredity from God," which is much as if one were to say, in teaching the multiplication table, "Remember that three times three is nine, except only the times when God makes it fifteen." So absolute a misconception of the very meaning of the word heredity could hardly be illustrated in any other way as in the idea of "getting it from God."

Scientific terms and facts of this nature cannot be confounded with metaphysical and religious speculation without hopeless confusion as to ideas, and absolute worthlessness as to the results of the investigation.

The very foundation principle of evolution itself depends upon the persistence of the laws of hereditary traits, habits, and conditions, modified and diversified by environment and by the introduction of other hereditary strains from other lines of ancestry.

Of course, there are people who do not believe that evolution evolves with any greater degree of regularity and persistence than is consistent with the idea of a deity who is liable to change his plans to meet the prayers or complaints of aspiration or repentance of those who chance to beg or demand of him certain immunities from the workings of the laws of nature. But with this type of mentality—with this grade of intellectual grasp—it were fruitless to pause to argue. They must be left to an education and an evolution of a less emotional and imaginativ cast before they will be able to take part intelligently in a scientific discussion even where the merest alphabet of the science is touched, as is the case in these essays. They must learn a method of thought which keeps inside of what is, or can be, known and demonstrated, and cease to vitiate the very basic premises by injecting into them what is merely hoped or prayed for. The two phases of thought are quite distinct and totally dissimilar in method.

The essays here collected which do not deal directly with heredity and its possibilities have been included in the book because of the repeated calls for them upon the different magazines in which they appeared and because they are rightly classed among the facts and fictions of life with which we wish here to deal.

That most of them touch chiefly the dark side of the topics discussed is due to the fact that they were one and all written for a purpose in which that method of handling seemed most effective. That there is a brighter side goes without saying; but when a physician is writing a lecture upon cholera or consumption he does not devote his time and space to pointing out the indubitable fact that many of us have not, and are not likely to contract, either one.

In pointing out and commenting upon certain social and hereditary conditions and evils which it is desirable to correct or to guard against, and which it is all-important we shall first recognize as existing and as in need of improvement, I have, it is true, dwelt chiefly upon the evil possibilities contained in these conditions. I am not, therefore, a pessimist. I do not fail to recognize the fact that both men and conditions are undoubtedly evolving into better and higher states than of old. If one may so express it, these essays are the expressions of a pessimistic optimist—one who is pessimistic upon certain phases of the present for the present, and optimistic as to and for the future. Let me illustrate: The housewife who does not have the house cleaned because it stirs up a dust to do it is in the position of those critics who insist that it is all wrong to call attention to abuses because abuses are not pleasant things to have held up to public gaze. Or like a physician who would say: "For heaven's sake don't remove that bandage from the broken skull to dress the wound or you will see something even uglier than this soiled and ill-arranged cloth. Trust to luck. Some people have recovered from even worse conditions than this without intelligent care and treatment. Let him do it."

I have often been asked how and why I ever chanced to think or write upon these topics. "How can a woman in your station and of your type know about them?" It is always difficult to say just how or why one mind does and another does not grasp any given thing.

When I was a very young girl I heard a famous judge read and discuss a series of papers which were then appearing in the Popular Science Monthly, and which were called "The Relations of Women To Crime." I was the only person admitted to the club, where the consideration of the papers took place, who was not mature in years and connected with one of the learned professions. I was admitted because I begged the privilege as the guest of the family of the judge at whose house the club met. More than any other one thing, perhaps, the thoughts and suggestions that came to me—a silent and unnoticed child—while listening to the discussions of those papers which, hinted at the various possibilities of inherited criminal tendencies—hearing the lawyers comment upon it from the point of view furnished by their court-room experiences, and the medical men from their side of the topic, as practitioners upon those who had inherited mental or physical diseases, and the educators from their outlook and experience with children and youths who had not yet begun an open criminal course, but who showed in their tendencies the need of intelligent training to modify or correct their faulty inheritance—more than any other one thing, perhaps, this experience of my childhood led me into the study of anthropology and heredity. That other people have been interested in what I have written from time to time upon this subject, and that I was, for this reason, asked to present certain phases of it at the recent World's Congress of Representative Women, accounts for the publication of this book at this time. I presume it will be said that it is not "pleasant reading for the summer season." It is not intended for that purpose. It has been asked for by many teachers, college professors, students, and medical practitioners, the latter of whom have shown extraordinary interest in its early issue and wide circulation, and for whose kind encouragement and aid I am glad to offer here renewed thanks.

I had intended to elaborate and enlarge and republish in book form "Sex in Brain," but since there have been hundreds of calls made for it, and since I have not yet found the time to combine, verify, and arrange the large amount of additional material which I have been steadily collecting through correspondence with leading anthropologists and brain anatomists in England, Scotland, Germany, France, and the United States, and other countries, ever since they received, with such cordial and kindly recognition, the within-printed essay, which they have had translated into several languages, I have concluded to include it with these, leaving it as it was abridged and delivered before the International Council in Washington in 1888.

Later on I hope to find time to arrange and verify and issue the new material on the subject. It has grown in confirmatory evidence as it has grown in bulk, with steady and assuring regularity.

What the Mohammedans Think of the Christians.

From the Moslem World.

Down in Tennessee last month a negro named Walker, who was accused of a criminal assault on a young woman near Bond Station, was taken from jail and lynched. The horrible incident is thus described in the Associated Press telegrams:

The attack on the jail began at 11 o'clock. The mob battered down the doors, found the negro's cell, and got him out. He fought fiercely, and bit several men severely. He was stabbed and slashed until the blood streamed from him in torrents. He was hustled off to a telegraph pole two blocks away, and a rope was fastened around his neck. He was lifted up, and his then naked body swung clear of the ground. Then a big railroad switchman pulled his legs until his neck cracked. The same man then mutilated the corpse. The negro was dead, or nearly so, before he was hanged. Walker tried to commit suicide before he was lynched by cutting his throat with a glass bottle found in his cell. After the body was cut down the mob raided a lumber-yard and, building a bonfire, burnt the dead negro. The fire was built in the middle of Front street, near the jail.

The attention of those who are so fond of quoting the "tree and fruit" adage is specially called to this incident. Is this one of the fruits of the church-Christian system? Tennessee is, nominally, a Christian state. Whenever anything occurs in a Mohammedan community that shocks us, it is reported to the church-Christian and secular papers as a Mohammedan atrocity, the natural outgrowth of the Islamic religion and social laws. Every man living in a Mohammedan community is, for the purposes of the newspaper article, considered as a Mohammedan (unless he has been converted to church-Christianity), and as a model exponent of the tendencies of his religion. If we were to follow the practices of the church-Christian missionaries and writers we would call this Tennessee affair "A Christian atrocity."

Negroes are not allowed to live in Sandoval, Ill. Two of the race went there to work as carpenters, and were told that if they did not leave the town they would be lynched. Sandoval is in a (so-called) Christian state, and a (so-called) Christian nation. We will now sing the 93d hymn, "Let us love one another," etc.

That little unpleasantness between Archbishop Corrigan and Mgr. Satolli was a very striking illustration of the real character of the Roman church organization.

The World's Fair officials succumbed to bigotry and ignorance on the 23d ult., and the gates of the great "international (?) show were closed. It is hard to believe that this is the "enlightened nineteenth century" we brag so much about.

Recently a Brooklyn man beat his wife to death, and then the neighbors disclosed the fact that it had been a practice with him to knock the poor woman down and jump on her with his heavy-soled boots until her body was a mass of bruises. How foolish it would be to call this one of the natural results of the church-Christian social system!

One of the peculiarities of the church-Christian system of marriage is that it is a religious ceremony until the knot is tied, after which it becomes a civil contract. In other words, the church ties the knot, but cannot untie it; the civil courts must do that. Under the Islamic law it is always a civil contract, and has no connection whatever with religion. This is at least consistent.

Edward H. Thompson, who lives near West Hurley, N. Y., recently sold his wife to Charles Lewis for forty-five cents. This is, nominally, a Christian country, and these people are, nominally, Christians. Now, if that had happened in a nominally Mohammedan community the church-Christian missionaries would have reported it to the American and European religious press as a Mohammedan custom, prescribed by Islamic law.

The Kingston (N. Y.) Freeman says: "A religion is not good for much unless it proves of positive advantage in the lives of those who profess it." This is a variation of the "tree and fruit" idiom, and if the editor had known that in every Mussulman community on earth the degree of morality is far greater, and the criminal record at least fifty per cent lower, than in any community of a corresponding size in England or America, he wouldn't have written this very unwise assertion. Quite a number of rural editors have learned that the "tree and fruit" adage is a boomerang that comes back to them with greater force than it manifested in going out, and they have stopped using it; but the Kingston Freeman man has yet to learn it.

Business is very dull at the Brooklyn churches, and it is said the pastor of the Duryea Presbyterian establishment is going to try pretty female ushers, as an inducement to the young men to attend. We had thought of suggesting chromos, but that scheme is being overdone by some of the newspapers. How would it do to try to revive the old gift-package plan? Give a sealed envelope to everyone who enters the church, and have one prize to every one hundred blanks. A plated tea-set or a watch and chain drawn occasionally might cause a great deal of interest. This suggestion is given gratis.

Two young girls were cruelly murdered at Bardwell, Ky., early last month, and the excited inhabitants subsequently lynched a negro who was suspected of having committed the crime. Quite a large number of the lynchers were in favor of torturing and burning the accused at the stake, and it was only after a heated argument that the more humane people present succeeded in their efforts to hang the man. It has since transpired that the negro was innocent, and that the mob, blinded by brutal rage, killed an innocent man. What a rare sensation this would have been for the church-Christian press if it had happened in a Mussulman community! As it is, very little has been printed about it.

A branch of Schweinfurth's Rockford, Ill., "Heaven" has been established at Lexington, Ky., and some of the church-Christians there are so indignant that they declare they will tar and feather Schweinfurth if he visits that city. This is the regulation church-Christian spirit; but what about our boasted civilization, which grants to every American citizen freedom of thought and the right to follow any religious belief he may select? It is about time that we Americans stopped bragging about "perfect freedom," or made an effort to show to the world that we are actually a tolerant people, and know what true freedom is.

On the 16th ult. Rev. John Beaver, a well-known church-Christian clergyman and "evangelist," at Richmond, Ind., drew his revolver and shot four times at Thomas G. Gray, one ball taking effect in the latter's thigh. The clergyman was jealous of his wife. Now, would it be fair to say that the tendency of church-Christianity was to cause its followers to go gunning for other people upon such a slight provocation as jealousy? If the shooter in this case had been a Mussulman, the American church-Christian press would have cited this incident as an illustration of the demoralizing effects of Islam. That is just about what they and many of the secular newspapers have been doing for these many years.

Mr. Emory F. Boyd, of New Britain, Conn., who is quite well known in the Eastern states as a journalist and author of considerable force and ability, writes: "As between Christianity and Islam, I give the preference to the latter—polygamy and all, slavery and all—because these, if evils at all, are nothing when compared with the gigantic evils that are everywhere the concomitants of Christianity—drunkenness, crime, bestiality, prostitution, vile personal habits, shocking profanity, etc., to say nothing of the millions of feticides, suicides, idiots, insane, and diseased. Surely nothing can be worse than 'Christian civilization,' and thousands of people are becoming conscious of this fact every day, though few dare to speak their minds. It is Christian hypocrisy, more than anything else, that affects to turn up its nose at polygamy. It is a Christian fashion, that is all."

A Beautiful System.

One of the Mint Reports says in effect: "The peculiar fitness of gold for the money basis is on account of its very great scarcity, its exceeding costliness, and its liability to wear and waste, and other qualities. Indeed, its scarcity is the great feature that renders it the proper basis. It can hardly be too scarce, and therefore it is necessary to employ representatives or substitutes." See Report for 1869. Now, this is in accord with the very spirit of the specie basis institution. The things that most unfit gold for use as money make it the money in fact. Custom, nature (for there is nature in our arts), declare that human confidence (commercial trust or credit) is the basis of all money circulation. Without that trust nothing can be fit for money, and money is that trust put into circulation and evidenced or represented by any sign custom or law favors. But we declare one of the signs or representatives is the money itself, and the other signs are representatives of it. This is reversing things with a vengeance. If we did the same way with regard to our titles to property, or any of our vehicles, ideal or real, the absurdity would be apparent, because we are not yet familiarized with such abuse outside of our money system. If gold is money, then there could be no money without gold. But we know better. If credit in circulation is money, then there can be no money without such credit. Let the law proclaim something is money no one trusts in—let it be declared legal tender—no one will take it but once. Trade will stop. And so we see that in spite of our law that says gold is the sole money, sole legal tender, yet ninety-five per cent of paper signs of credit in circulation rise up in remonstrance and prove your law is a lie. Surely to men capable of reason this is enough. Then consider the frightful consequences of such mislegislation. A thing unfit for money is declared the sole legal tender, "for the very reason it is so scarce and unfit for circulation." (See Report of Mint referred to.) Immediately a vast amount, some ninety-five per cent, of all business is done by non-legal tenders. No one is obliged to take them. As certain as death a truce must come when confidence fails in one hour all over the world. Every non-legal tender effort is hurried for redemption, leaving ninety per cent unredeemed, unless some of the five per cent legal tender gets back into bank to do the work over. But it is just here that failure of credit stays the circulation of legal tender also. It is assuredly the maddest scheme ever adopted. The British government being partner with the Bank of England was able to put a stop to demands on it—sustaining its false principles by false conduct. But a free, equal government has no such power. It must bear its evils. Thus we had to wade through blood to free our slaves, while Russia rids herself by a simple command. We cannot adopt in part the ways of kingly governments. All or none.

Why Doesn't He Save?

JEANNETTE, PA., July 31, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I write to let you know that I read the good old paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Long may it wave. I am down on religion. May it be banished. I read in the paper the other day about a Presbyterian preacher who went out bathing and was drowned. That makes me think if God is so good as he preached him to be, and if he is infinit, would he not have saved a good lamb?

The Ingersoll University.

NEW ERA, ORE., July 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The proposition of Marcia Goff, of Kearney, Neb., is a very good one, and if they go to build an Ingersoll University anywhere in the United States I am willing to subscribe $5 to it at present, and when it will be near completion I shall donate some more. Let every Liberal do likewise and we shall soon have a nice monument for Mr. R. G. Ingersoll, whom I admire and with right call the greatest man of the nineteenth century and the smartest man in America. May he live long and be able to do more yet for enlightenment, progress, and advancement.

Wishing you and all the gentlemen writing for your paper long life, happiness, and prosperity, I remain,

Your Liberal friend,

DAVID WITTENBERG.

To Help Our Congress.

ST. LOUIS, MO., July 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Knowing that there are Freethinkers in St. Louis by the thousand, I would like to ask you, dear readers, is it not possible for a few of us to do something in order to assist those brave workers at the head of the Freethinkers' party who are now inviting co-workers from every country of the world to come and hold an International Congress at Chicago October 1st? Anyone who has had the experience of getting money on a subscription list knows that it is an ungrateful way. I will therefore suggest that ten or more go together and get up a picnic, and probably a boat excursion. Should the reader think this a good way to help fight superstition, please send your name and address to me and I will call a meeting immediately.

Respectfully, NILS GRANT.

This Club Is a Model of Activity.

CHICAGO, ILL., Aug. 2, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: After discussing the question, "Should Church Property Be Taxed?" the Chicago Question Club last Sunday adopted the following resolutions:

WHEREAS, For services rendered we as justly owe taxes to government as wages to individuals;

WHEREAS, Churches have received government benefits without returning tax money equivalent therefor;

WHEREAS, Some can escape just taxation only by over-taxing others;

WHEREAS, To preach morality yet practice immorality by evading just taxes is inconsistent and hypocritical; and,

WHEREAS, Complete separation of church and state necessitates that each should stand on its own bottom, keep separate accounts, and compensate the other for services rendered; therefore be it

Resolved, That church property should be equally taxed with all other property.

Resolved, That until churches refuse to become a party thereto, by receiving unjust and fraudulent tax-exemption, their moral influence will remain weak as that of Satan preaching piety.

Through the persistent efforts of your correspondent Mayor Harrison has granted our club permission to hold open-air single-tax meetings every Sunday afternoon on Market street near Madison.

After showing them the single tax, we offer to make our auditors associate members of the club on condition that they sign a promise to read the literature we give them and attend single-tax meetings when convenient. They pay a five-cent initiation fee and receive copies of the No. 2 Government edition of Henry George's "Protection or Free Trade?" and such other literature as we have on hand. The initiation fee thus covers the cost of literature and we thus evade the necessity of a license for selling it, and the recipient, having paid something to get it, is more likely to read it to get his money's worth out of it. Thus we disposed of forty-odd copies of "Protection or Free Trade?" last Sunday. We also distributed cards of our meeting-place.

Could not Freethought organizations work on similar lines in disseminating Freethought literature?

Christians Are Brave When No Enemy Is About.

CANTRIL, IA., July 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: We had Mr. J. E. Remsburg with us here on the 17th of this month. He gave us an elegant speech on "The False Claims of the Church." This was the first Liberal speech ever delivered in Cantril. My orthodox friends stayed away. I tried to get them to come out and hear Mr. J. E. Remsburg, but no, they had headache, stomach trouble, or rheumatism. But since Mr. J. E. Remsburg is gone they come up and unlimber their guns and are ready with shot and shell to sweep the field and give no quarter. My Christian friends to-day put me in mind of some soldiers in the time of the Rebellion. They were always blowing their horn how they could kill rebels, and wishing all the time that God would bring the rebels to a stand so they could kill them. But alas, when the enemy made a stand for fight those God-fighting people were two miles back at the provision train or commissary and filling up on Jeremiah's ale, hardtack, and sow-belly. I think we will have Mr. J. E. Remsburg back here again this fall. When he comes again I am going to get some of those ministers out, and if they want to fight they can have a chance. I believe in a man standing up for the flag that he fights under and never giving it up until he sees he is wrong, and then surrender like a man. Yours always, ALEX. FIX.

Government Is As Bad As Religion.

CINCINNATI, O., Apr. 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have read a great deal of the argument appearing in THE TRUTH SEEKER on the subject of closing the World's Fair on Sundays. Up to this time the Christians—so-called—have been able to maintain the upper hand in this matter, and probably will continue to do so to the end of the game. Now, I have come to this conclusion, that if these fanatics are going to make a semi-religious affair out of the Fair, then every real Freethinker should stay away from it and let them run it. Now, the census gives the number of Freethinkers in the whole country as ten or twelve millions, and I take it to mean that many adults. Now, if this be so, would not the failure of all these Freethinkers to attend the Fair come very near, if not quite, making a failure of it? At all events, it would cripple it very much, more especially as there is very likely to be a boycott on it by some of the trade union organizations of the country. The fact is, if the trade union men were to live up to their principles strictly, they would every man of them boycott it. What is the whole thing anyhow but a gigantic advertising scheme in which the wealth-producers are to pay the main part of the expenses of the display, and from which they will reap no adequate return? In all probability ninety-nine per cent of the exhibitors are hypocritical Christians, church-members at least, and oppressors of labor. caring for nothing but the acquisition of the almighty dollar.

But this is unpatriotic! Yes, it is unpatriotic, and right on that very point is where the Christian pharisees will catch the Freethinkers and fool workingmen and cause them to play right into their hands by giving their presence and their dollars to the semi-religious World's Fair this summer. When the superstition of government has faded out of the minds of the average Freethinker and workingman to the same extent that the Christian religion has, then and not till then will the Christian pharisees be unable to abridge the liberties of the people by closing on Sundays places of amusement, recreation and education—understand me, patriotism is to government what fanaticism is to religion, and when a man has lost his belief in a revealed religion the priest can no longer appeal to his fanaticism, and knowing this he appeals to his patriotism, which is easily aroused on account of the belief in the twin superstition. W. G. SCOTT.

How Religions Literature Looks When Dissected.

ELSINORE, CAL., Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian Herald says:

Are they to be pitied whom the Lord allows to be placed in difficult, almost impossible positions? There are circumstances in the lives of some of God's children which cannot be explained to any but God, and which can be understood by no other; circumstances which bring a child of God to such an intimate walk with him that every step must be taken with the Lord, or it may be a false one. There are positions where a life is indeed hid with Christ in God. The name of Esther means "secret; hidden;" and her life is a sample of many lives in which all the surroundings are adverse to a life of holiness, and where witness for God seems to be an impossibility.

It seems like a waste of paper to comment on such silly drivel as the above, and yet there are millions in the world who read or listen to just such statements, and on account of the fear and superstition instilled into their minds in youth fail to blame their God for allowing his "children" to get into such "difficult and impossible positions."

If the Lord is really to blame for the positions in which some of his ministers are surprised ("Crimes of Preachers"), we should perhaps be more lenient with them and try to devise some plan whereby the real offender could be brought before the bar of justice. The first half of the second sentence seems to be absolutely true and as deplorable as it is absolute. If the intimation of the first sentence is true, i. e., that "the Lord" is to blame, perhaps it explains that only God can explain the circumstances described in the second sentence. The meaning of the writer is so completely hidden in the third sentence that we might almost believe God wrote it, or that John dreamed it. The idea of a position being "hid with Christ in God" rarely presents itself to people nowadays. Some of these religious editors get the names of God, Christ, the Holy Ghost, Mary, and Joseph so jumbled and mixed up, that it reminds me of a cat-fight—you can hardly tell which is getting the best of it.

I decline to discuss the last sentence, or to discuss Esther or her "secret"—"hidden" or unhidden. If any of THE TRUTH SEEKER readers are determined to read such obscenity as appears in the book of Esther they can send to some Bible concern and have it transmitted through the United States mail for the regular rates on obscene literature. F. H. HEALD.

A Reminiscence.

YOUNGSTOWN, O., Apr. 21, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In 1889-1890, I published a list of preachers' crimes in the paper I was then publishing in Cincinnati.

As secretary of the Ohio State Brewers' Association, I appeared before a legislative caucus that session—1889-1890—to advocate the passage of an anti-sumptuary measure. The preachers were there lobbying against me, resorting to some very secular tactics, and eventually bulldozed the members, against their pledges and convictions, into beating my measure by four votes on joint ballot. So much as a premise for this. After the preachers had buttonholed, protested, and threatened, I made my little say—while so doing, among other points: "Gentlemen, the only opposition, except partisan, which we expect appears from our 'reverend' friends. They represent a church property value of not less than $75,000,000 in this district of our state. But that $75,000,000, in way of taxes, revenue for local, state, or national measures, or public income pro bono publico, represents 0. These preachers themselves perform neither jury nor military duty, are of no practical benefit whatever to the commonwealth; they and their property representation receive all the benefits without bearing any of the burdens of citizenship. My constituency, with $50,000,000 invested, pays general and special taxes on every dollar invested. Thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars flow annually from their tills into the public coffers. They pay their own and the churches' taxes. They perform the duties and bear the burdens the preachers evade. And, in conclusion, gentlemen, I here present for your inspection a printed and absolutely authentic eight-column itemized list, with each charge specified, with name and date of criminal and crime, of more than five hundred Protestant preachers arrested in the United States within the past fourteen months for crimes involving moral turpitude. And mark you, during that period of time not one brewer, of the more than fifty thousand in the United States, has been charged with or arrested for any crime whatever!

"In view of these undeniable facts, which I am prepared to substantiate if anyone doubts, the wishes of which class are the better entitled to consideration by our legislators—the non-burden-bearing, non-producing, non-laboring, evangelical fungus sapping the commercial tree it never nurtures, and whose crimes clog our courts and swell the tax-levy, or the thrifty, industrious, labor employing, tax-paying, public-spirited business-men who sustain the courts, but do not attend them in the capacity of prisoners at the bar?"

No one could deny the correctness of the allegations, but the preachers whipped the allegation—of course.

With best wishes, Fraternally,

THOMP. BURTON.

Takes Exception to a News Item Which We Intended to Be Entirely Uncolored.

PARKER, KAN., Aug. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have been a constant subscriber for twelve or fifteen years, and have done all I could to induce others to subscribe, but if you intend to follow the course you have taken, particularly in the last two issues of your paper, please to do me the favor to drop my name from your list. Every person with whom I am acquainted that takes your paper is a "Populist," and the untruthful things said of Governor Lewelling will not be tolerated.

Nothing is being left undone or unsaid by the Republican masters or the Democrats who vote the Republican ticket that would tend to embarrass his administration, and to think our TRUTH SEEKER would stoop to assist in circulating these lies seems to me very strange. Do you think the people who gave to the Republican ticket four years ago a majority of eighty-two thousand have brought about this political change without cause? No, sir. The People's party is made up of the Liberal, liberty-loving, and progressive portion of our citizens. Without going into a statement of our needs and demands, you will allow me to add that this is an honest effort of the masses to better their condition, not by force, but through the ballot. It is a fight for home, for our children. Through oppression the seed of discontent is sown, and it will increase until relief comes. Every Methodist priest, every Catholic priest, in our state is either a Republican or Democrat. Do you wish to add your name to that crowd of dictators? If so, we will part company now. I earnestly hope you will cease to publish such cursed stuff. A paper that has always stood for truth and liberty should now avoid aiding the enemies of free speech, free press, and free homes.

Fraternally yours,

WILBUR F. DALLAS.

[We think it would have been in better spirit for Mr. Dallas to have shown the statements to be untrue than to write as he does. If they are untrue, we regret their appearance in THE TRUTH SEEKER—though in nowise to blame, as we must depend upon the daily papers for news. If, however, the statements are true, orders to part company would not deter us from stating them. We went through that ordeal once, in the case of the Chicago Anarchists. We lost many friends for telling the truth about that matter, but to-day our words are justified by the governor of Illinois, who points out the monstrous injustice committed upon the Anarchists, and pardons those who were not hung. We are not telling the truth for $3 a year, but because it is the truth,

If we are unwittingly led into error, our columns are always open to corrections, with thanks to those who set us right.—

The Modern an Improvement Over the Old Methods of Persecution.

"Men from habit become conservativ. We learn to love what we are accustomed to, and misguided affection makes us cling with death-like tenacity to social and political institutions long after they have ceased to be useful or serviceable to the human race—yes, long after they have become the instruments of injustice and oppression. Luther's Reformation corrected many abuses in the Romish church, but the Protestantism which he left to the world carries in its bosom the tyranny of opinion which, while greatly mitigating the severity of former church discipline, is quite effective in deterring men from too liberal indulgence of independent thought in construction of doctrinal standards. The church does not compel a recantation on bended knee of obnoxious scientific opinions, but it puts a quietus on advanced thought by a resolution of its general assembly, lest the vulgar world, the laity, may be set to thinking outside of established theological lines. The method of silencing Briggs is no doubt to be preferred to that applied to the tongue of Galileo, but both methods answered to the purpose, and both illustrate the tendency of institutions to perpetuate themselves by means of the veneration in which they are held and the dread they inspire. Institutions represent opinion, and public opinion is as potent as thumbscrews to repress independence and enslave thought. As long as the system remains we permit non-essential modifications, changes in methods, but revolt at radical innovations that would sweep away the system itself even for something better. Romanism reappears in Protestantism in a less severe form, with apparently a larger tolerance and a more benignant spirit, but is still carrying in its bosom all the possibilities of old Romanism as it existed in Luther's day.

"There is this difference, as a writer suggests, modern civilization has too many material interests at stake to permit an extreme indulgence of propensity to prosecute. It puts its staying hand, therefore, on the tendency to ecclesiastical domination, and thus unconsciously enables the liberal and humane sentiment to more fully assert itself in all the churches. But this staying hand does not press against the system itself. This would be a shock and outrage to inherited prejudice and affectation which civilization finds it convenient and useful to foster."

These Liberal words were spoken to an audience of five thousand people at a Chautauquan assembly by a man who, at the last general election, received more than a hundred thousand votes for governor of his state. This speech was made, not for a discussion of the ideas of religion, but for a political effect. The truths he states are applicable to the inherited prejudice of the people. Probably thousands who heard or read this speech will not question the conclusions, though many will not think their religious ideas are included therein. As he states it, there are many people who honestly believe that they are as liberal as any, and do not know where or how their ideas have become so firmly fixed as to deny to others the rights they claim for themselves. His political friends, who are also Christians, doubtless thought this was a hard hit at their political opponents, and yet never realized that it was their own religious ideas that were as much at fault as the political ideas of their opponents. The Hon. T. L. Nugent, who spoke these words at San Marcos, Tex., is doubtless a thinker who is not bound to the "public opinion" which is as potent as thumbscrews to repress independence and enslave thought. He has spoken these thoughts fearlessly and in deliberation before thousands of critics. He has thus placed himself upon a broad, liberal platform for the rights of investigation of political, religious, and scientific subjects.

Respectfully, JAMES H. PARKS.

DOUGLAS, IA., July 2, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: My husband, Daniel McDuffee, after a painful and lingering illness, passed calmly and peacefully away, June 25th, at 6:30 P.M. He was born in Cabot, Caledonia county, Vt., May 26, 1817, and was aged seventy-six years and twenty-nine days. He came to Auburn township, Fayette county, Ia., in 1849, where he has since resided. He is the father of seven children, of whom six are yet living; one having preceded him to the unknown beyond. Brought up under Congregational rule, he shook off the yoke of superstition on arriving at manhood and became a bold, fearless, and unfaltering Freethinker, and died as he had lived, with no fear of an angry God or endless hell. He often requested me to let no orthodox preacher disgrace his funeral with his presence. Accordingly when our acquaintances came to prepare the body for interment and inquired if I had decided upon a minister, I requested that they bring a Liberal to read a funeral service and hymn from the Freethinker's Book of Hymns, Recitations, and Funeral Services, etc., which they promised to do, but did nothing and baffled me in everything. I was alone, both his children and mine being so far away, and he could not be kept, his disease being heart failure and dropsy, consequently he was taken from the house and to the grave and buried without a word spoken over his remains. I also requested that his grave be made in some pleasant, retired nook, as we had been but a short time in Douglass and had neglected making any choice of a lot. Our dear Christian brother who has care of the cemetery willed it otherwise, and had the sexton make the grave in an old lot where two corpses had been exhumed only two months previous. One of them had lain there fourteen years. They started in to open one of the old graves, but it caved in upon them and they were obliged to dig his a little to one side. I knew nothing of this until two days after the interment. It nearly drove me wild. It was nearly as great a shock to me as his death. And now he lies only a few yards from the entrance gate where he will be trampled over by Christian feet. This is Christianity's inhumanity to man. My husband and myself were the only Freethinkers in this little hamlet of two hundred inhabitants, and just now and the last two weeks they have been holding a great howling revival. Since my husband's death I am the only one that is not called where few are chosen. Not being satisfied with giving injury as well as insult, the correspondent had an obituary in one of the county papers:

Daniel McDuffee, one of the early county settlers, died at his home Sunday evening, aged seventy-eight. He was the father of a large family, none of whom are now living near here. He was a man of many domestic difficulties, which at last so embittered his life that he lost all fear of God or love for man and even forbade his remains to be respected with a Christian burial. Such a case was never before known.

But giving his age as seventy-eight is a mistake. That thrust about domestic difficulties was given merely because he was not a Christian. Certainly we never had any difficulty about our religion, as Christians do, for THE TRUTH SEEKER was our gospel and Thomas Paine our god, R. G. Ingersoll our new-born savior, and Messrs. S. P. Putnam, J. E. Remsburg, C. B. Reynolds, Watson Heston, and J. R. Charlesworth our angels. What embittered his life more than anything else was being swindled out of his possessions by Christian bigots and hypocrites. So we will count that mistake number two. And as to such a case being never before known is mistake number three in something less than a dozen lines, for two men have died right in the town where the county paper is printed that made the same request and were buried according to their belief. I remain,

Yours for Freethought, justice, and truth,
MRS. D. McDUFFEE.

Reads and Tolerates All.

ANTRIM, N. H., July 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: As I take all sorts of papers to read, I must of course take some that do not advocate the same doctrine that I do, but as I am a firm believer in personal rights, I allow everyone to think and speak for themselves; so you see that I am living up to St. Paul's doctrine—if there ever was such a person, doubtful in my mind. But whether there was or was not, he was much like his Lord and master, always contradicting himself in his statements. That is, he wanted all men to be well convinced on any subject in their own mind, and any reasonable person would suppose that he was willing and anxious to have them act according to their own judgment. But no, you must do just as he said or go to "L." And as I read all of my books and papers through, and try to understand what the writer means in his remarks, and having common sense, I am deriving some knowledge from other people's mind, providing I have got sense enough to know when a person is talking common sense. And now let me say right here, that is the reason that I take THE TRUTH SEEKER and Ironclad Age, and should take many more of the same kind if I was able. For all such papers tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but truth, without the help of any God or any other great being, and it sounds to me a great deal better to have any person tell a story without being prompted by some one. But as I am wandering somewhat from the main point of what I intended, I will stop and commence. What I intended to say was this: I see on the fifth page of my weekly Witness an article headed "Rumors of Danger." Now, by the reading of the article the people are getting their eyes a little opened in regard to Catholicism—just what our papers have been telling them and Heston has been picturing to them right along for the last two or three years—and now at the last hour they begin to see the devil. Oh, yes, but just see how their own devil is trying to quiet them by quoting from the book of Daniel. I do not say but that he is quoting from the right book or saying, but I do say that he is quoting from no particular part of the reading, and I think that he should take the eighth chapter and commence to read, and when he gets to the fifth verse then look sharp and read slow. For I am a-going to suppose that I am Daniel. Now, the he-goat is Ingersoll. Now read on until you get to the twelfth verse. There you will read what the colonel's doctrine is a-going to do. Then read on to the eighteenth verse, and you will see the people are all the same way. But Robert will wake them up and will tell them what to do. Now read the twenty-fourth verse, and you will see that the colonel is not alone, but there are all of our big speakers with him, such as Jamieson, Remsburg, Bell, and a thousand and one others on the male side. Then there are Helen H. Gardener, Susan Wixon, and as many more on the ladies' side that are a-going to help. And by the time that I am as old as I see some of my noble brothers and sisters are, I shall see this vision come to pass, and I think that whenever this comes to pass that every priest and minister in the world will be so sick that they will know just how to pity poor old Daniel.

But now, my dear friends, do not faint. The time is just as sure to come as the sun is to rise to-morrow, for if you will only stop and think one moment you will see that there is not born nowadays one fool where there used to be twenty, and our schoolhouses are ten times as numerous and give three times as much schooling as the people used to have when I was a boy. Now, will any person with common sense stand up and say that the vision will not come so that those who can live forty years from now will have the enjoyment to see something of a heaven on this earth?—not saying that there will be the breaking out of two or three hells before that time, for we all know that whenever the people have tried to bind old Satan, those that kept him in their stock in trade would kick like a mule, and they will always. But I say for now and always, keep your whip a-going and we shall kill the devil at last.

H. B. RALEIGH.

When Women Become Free We Shall All Be Free.

KEARNEY, NEB., July 31, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 10th is an article entitled "An Appeal to Women." I agree with the writer that Liberal women should do all they can to help remove the mental bondage that prevails among women. Thousands of them are blindly clinging to worn-out dogmas, creeds, and superstitions, and persistently refusing to help roll away the stone that bars their progress. It has been truly said, "There is no slave so degraded as the one who hugs his chain and does not want freedom." So women are giving their influence and support to that which has always enslaved them in the past, and is holding, not only woman, but the race, back to-day.

Freethinkers, both men and women, should be at all times ready to express their conviction, especially when they can benefit others by so doing. All questions, both civil and religious, should be open to argument; nothing clears up a subject like debate. Let us have discussion, agitation, conflict, for out of these whatever is true and vital will come at last. The readiness with which women signed petitions for closing the World's Fair on Sunday evidences the need of missionary work among them. Women should be the last ones to help preachers or anyone else to violate our national Constitution, or tear down any of the safeguards its noble and far-seeing founders placed therein to protect us from religious persecution, war, and bloodshed. Fortunately for us and our beloved country, they wisely placed religious questions beyond the control of Congress.

Many thoughtful, liberty-loving women feel humiliated and aggrieved at this action of their countrywomen who signed these petitions. If women would read and investigate Bibles for themselves, they would soon find out what they really are—a collection of books, good, bad, and indifferent, written at different times by different authors, when and by whom there is no exact knowledge; full of mistakes and much that is reprehensible; adorned here and there with passages of spiritual and poetic beauty; every good thought and deed that is recorded inspired just as they always have been and are to-day, by the aspirations of the human heart for that which is noble and beautiful and true. We presume that in none of the many Bibles extant is woman considered the equal of man. In contradistinction to this we are gratified to find that a woman's day is to be one of the prominent features of the Congress of Freethinkers. This shows that they are believers in equality and justice, and that no whole-souled Freethinker would deny his mother or wife any of the privileges he claims for himself. All around us we see women unable to rise above the cruel, ignorant ideas, prejudices, and customs of past ages. They have envied her so long that they have become ingrained in her nature and it will be no easy task to change or eradicate them. Woman's lot has always been a hard one. Priests, preachers, lawmakers, and other interested persons have always assumed the right to mark out her sphere and control her destiny. All laws, teachings, and influences have tended to make her subservient to the will of others until dignity and self-respect are crushed and individuality lost. "Women, keep silent," "women, be obedient," has been rung in their ears for ages. Men have discussed the question as to whether woman possessed a soul—and might be doing so to-day if it were not inexpedient. Women are so necessary to help pay salaries and fill church pews. Is it any wonder that men have so long tamely submitted to religious, political, and financial tyranny when such enslaved, cowardly women have been their mothers? Let women, so far as space in THE TRUTH SEEKER permits, express their convictions and give their reasons for the faith that is in them. Let us hear from the woman who believes the "rib story," as well as those who do not. Let some one tell us why Adam, just got up after an infallible pattern, failed to have honesty enough to tell his bride about those dreadful apples, and after eating part of them himself, allowed all the blame to fall upon Mrs. Adam; and why Jesus never mentioned Adam and Eve although sent to atone for their sins. Let us have discussion that will lead woman out of superstition and ignorance into knowledge and light, and fit her mind to receive the newer, broader views of life and its uses, which nature and science are unfolding.

A great man has said, "When women reason, and babes sit in the lap of philosophy, the victory of reason over the shadowy host of darkness will be complete." V. M. G.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

That's the Way.

Just a little every day,
That's the way
Seeds in darkness swell and grow.
Tiny blades push through the snow,
Never any flower of May
Leaps to blossom in a burst.
Slowly—slowly—at the first.
That's the way!
Just a little every day.
Just a little every day.
That's the way
Children learn to read and write.
Bit by bit, and mite by mite,
Never anyone, I say,
Leaps to knowledge and its power.
Slowly—slowly—hour by hour,
That's the way!
Just a little every day.

From Sunapee-Land.

WOODLAND WALKS AND PLEASANT RAMBLES —SUNAPEE INDUSTRIES—PERSONAL MENTION.

Whichever way one turns in this delightful region, new beauties unfold before the enraptured gaze of the beholder. A walk in the woods or on the hills is always a feast. The feet press the softest, greenest mosses, and many flowers and fragrant herbs bend and smile on either side. Wintergreen, the partridge berry, the snow-flower, wild clematis, rare yellow clover, life-everlasting, bayberry, many varieties of fern, and various other wilding plants and nestling blossoms peep from the spongy earth, while the birds twitter and sing amid the pines, hemlocks, and leaning birches, seemingly in love with their surroundings.

Among the industries at Sunapee is the shop for the manufacture of hames, something belonging to the harness of horses. A visit to the pulp mill is not uninteresting. Great logs of spruce are placed between two immense granite blocks, and in fifteen minutes are reduced or crushed into a loose mass of pulpy matter, which by the aid of machinery and water is made into a soft, cheesy consistency. This is spread upon rollers, and by another process is fashioned into sheets of thick material, which in another establishment is readily converted into paper, upon which is printed the news of the day. So we may see that even the forests contribute to our happiness and comfort in a literary as well as physical way, reminding us of our dependence upon the simple things around us. The pulp mill is under the care of Superintendent Abbott, who is always pleased to show courteous attention to strangers.

A little farther on from the pulp-mill, and the ramble comes to the workshop of the talented artist, Mr. Alfred Dingle, whose work speaks for itself. From the superior quality of native Sunapee granite, Mr. Dingle evolves many beautiful figures, the chiseled features of which seem almost ready to speak to the beholder. What a genius it is to be able to bring forms of loveliness from the dull and senseless stone, to portray the emotions so visibly as to affect one to tears or smiles. How patient is the work of the sculptor, and how happy must he be as he sees the gradual unfoldment of his dream! Mr. Dingle, as an artist, has before him a bright career. His faithful helpers, too, as slowly, with mallet and chisel, they unlock the mysteries of the marble, are deserving of much praise and encouragement.

There are but two churches in this pleasant town, only one of which is in working order. Perhaps there is but little need of churches in such a charming spot where Nature dispensed her gifts in so lavish a manner; where every forest path is a revelation; where the rhythm of the river makes unceasing melody, rivaling the choir of the finest cathedral, and the hills seem uttering a never-ending benediction.

Among many pleasant people that it has been my good fortune to meet since sojourning here, is Hon. W. C. Sturoc, whose fine poem on Lake Sunapee was sent you last week. Mr. Sturoc is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and is one of the rare gentlemen whom it is a pleasure to meet. Of fine attainments, scholarly and apt, he possesses that wonderful charm of manner and conversation that is attractive to everyone. His intellectual attainments and his blameless life have attached to him many friends who greatly admire his rare qualities of mind and heart.

Mrs. Etta Marden, another of our TRUTH SEEKER friends, lives at Pennacook, in this state. She very kindly sends an invitation to the editor of the Corner to visit her in her home; and it is with feelings of regret that this invitation, with some others, will have to be declined, though it would give us the greatest pleasure to grasp our dear friend by the hand. Another time it may be so that our mutual desires will be gratified. S. H. W.

Correspondence.

DELMONT, S. D., July 25, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my second attempt to write to the Corner.

I like to read the Corner very much. Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for fifteen years and thinks he could not do without it. I do not see many letters from Dakota.

We like it very well here, although we are going to southwest Missouri this fall on account of the alkali water. We just moved here a year ago last March. We have no fruit here, and Pa thinks he cannot do without that. We were always accustomed to lots of fruit in Iowa.

Our school was out about two weeks ago. The weather got too warm to go to school.

I think your pieces of poetry very nice. I have them all cut out and am saving them to paste in a book.

Well, I will close for this time.

Ever your friend,

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

With the eighth edition.

Winwood Reade's "Martyr-

dom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardener's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral. We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is to holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN AND REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Li-ousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abs- on; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Att-pts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, $1.

THE WORLD WANTS TO KNOW, WHAT GOOD RESULTS?

In direct opposition to Mr. Mitchell's orthodox argument comes a series of books from the Truth Seeker Company, "An Agnostic's View of the Resurrection," the "Creation of God," and the "Handbook of Freethought." The Agnostic in question is Don Allen, and he is visibly disturbed by the Christian acceptance of the resurrection, and has "concluded to give my theory of what took place at the tomb." And that theory is that Pilate removed the body of the savior from the grave and secreted it in order to prevent a riot that would follow any desecration of the tomb by the multitude. To the setting forth and substantiation of this theory the author devotes his energies.

The "Creation of God" is contributed by Dr. Jacob Hartmann, and goes over the old familiar lines. The first four chapters are devoted to the consideration of the chief aspects of the natural universe. The author endeavors to demonstrate that, search where you will in the universe, suns, stars, planets, satellites, this terrestrial globe, its atmosphere, infinitesimal space, chemical constituents, animal and vegetable life, all, all, everything known, is found to be natural, governed by natural laws, "and not a vestige, not the remotest shadow, of anything supernatural, of a God or gods, is to be found." He assails also the first ten chapters of Genesis, shows "how the idea of God originated," takes up Old Testament history in its natural order, and plays havoc with accepted orthodoxy. This and much more of the same sort conclude with an appeal to people to eat proper food, keep their feet dry, and "remember that dead men enjoy nothing."

Mr. W. S. Bell informs the readers of his "Handbook of Freethought" that he has "aimed in preparing this work to put into compact and orderly form a large amount of irrefragable evidence against the superstitions of the church." This evidence consists of a good deal of old straw that has been thrashed over by Paine, Ingersoll, and all that class of orators and writers. Of course as a "handbook" nothing else could be reasonably expected. The precise usefulness of such a book does not seem exactly clear, but it is inferred that the compilation gave Mr. Bell great pleasure, and it is sure that the perusal will supply a number of smart sayings for immature young people to throw at their grandmothers.

Yet, after all, considering the temper in which these books are written, considering their sneering, cynical, querulous tone, what good results? ("Handbook of Freethought," "The Creation of God," "An Agnostic's View of the Resurrection," Truth-Seeker Company.)—New York World.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Gems of Thought.

CERTAINLY, if the Bible is such a revelation as men claim, it has egregiously failed to answer the purpose for which it was intended, seeing that men equally able, earnest, and sincere differ among themselves radically and hopelessly.—Chadwick.

In ecclesiastical history we see Christians denouncing and excommunicating one another for supposed error, and every denomination has been pronounced accursed—anathema maranatha—by some portion of the Christian world; so that, were the curses of men to prevail, not one human being would enter heaven.—Dr. Channing.

VOLTAIRE demonstrated that the origin of all religions is the same, the same mysteries—the same miracles—the same imposture—the same temples and ceremonies—the same kind of founders, apostles, and dupes—the same promises and threats—the same pretense of goodness and forgiveness and the practice of the same persecution and murder. He proved that religion made enemies—philosophy friends. These were his crimes.—Ingersoll.

OUR free press, also, and our free speech are great educators. In these days we are compelled to see and hear and think. The narrow-minded man is unhappy and distracted. He is no longer protected in his little system by college or cloister walls. A myriad unwelcome facts peer in at him from every side—from the circulating library, from the interesting novel, from the omnipresent and iconoclastic newspaper. The man of mental bias is veritably a victim of persecution. Optimists tell us that the world is growing honest. I am optimist enough to believe that it is growing broad-minded. Perforce it must. The air is full of everybody's ideas. They circulate everywhere, and act as a series of incessant shocks wherever they find a mind too narrowly planned to admit them. Hence men are beginning to avoid systems as the cause of more friction than they save. They are willing to sacrifice a narrow love of unity and consistency for a broader harmony with the spirit of the age.—Professor Patrick on the Psychology of Prejudice.

In order to believe a miracle, it is not enough merely to have seen it; for a man may be deceived. A fool is often called a dealer in wonders; and not merely do many excellent persons think that they have seen what they have not seen, and heard what was never said to them—not only do they thus become witnesses of miracles, but they become also subjects of miracles. They have been sometimes diseased, and sometimes cured by supernatural power; they have been changed into wolves; they have traveled through the air on broomsticks; they have become both incu i and succubi. It is necessary that the miracle should have been seen by a great number of very sensible people, in sound health, and perfectly disinterested in the affair. It is above all necessary, that it should have been solemnly attested by them; for if solemn forms of authentication are deemed necessary with respect to transactions of a very simple character, such as the purchase of a house, a marriage contract, or a will, what particular and minute cautionary formalities must not be deemed requisite in order to verify things naturally impossible, on which the destiny of the world is to depend.—Voltaire.

THERE are three main groups of influences which more or less control the will of man, and which set certain definite limits to his actions. The first and most powerful of these influences resides in the individual organization of each person, and in his physical and moral tendencies, impulses, inclinations, and characteristics which are mostly inherited from parents and ancestors. The second influence is the force of training, education, and example, acting upon the innate character, and producing thereon sometimes a beneficial, and sometimes a deleterious effect. The third influence lies in the external circumstances of life and in the action of the surroundings or media within which each individual man does and must move. In the most superficial sense we reckon among these media: country, climate, natural conditions in general, also manners and customs, social and political circumstances, stages of civilization and knowledge, peculiarities of character, the style of feeding and living in use among the people, nation, or race to which the individual belongs; lastly, the special personal circumstances by which everyone living in the midst of a community is affected in the same way as he is by general circumstances. These are: health, nutrition, wealth or poverty, abundance or privation, social position, happiness or misery, and so on.—Büchner.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

News of the Week.

CHOLERA is prevailing extensively in Russia. At Naples, Italy, the deaths from it are thirty a day.

It is now learned that the naval disagreement between France and England on the 28th and 29th ult. nearly occasioned a war. Lord Roseberry said a few days ago: "We were nearer to a war with France a week ago to-day than at any time since Waterloo."

PROF. ST. GEORGE MIVART's work, "Happiness in Hell," which originally appeared in the Nineteenth Century, and which provoked a lengthy controversy and a deluge of comment, has been placed by the Vatican in the Index Expurgatorius.

JOHN FINN, of St. Louis, on the 8th attempted to murder his four young children and himself, using a flatiron, a razor, and a scissors. All were badly injured and some will die. At the hospital Finn said: "I thought if I could only kill myself we could go right straight to heaven."

MONSIGNOR SATOLLI, the papal delegate to the United States, has just made a tour of the country. He was everywhere received with sumptuous demonstrations of reverence. A great railroad president residing at St. Paul placed at his disposal his own private car, and provided for the free transportation of him and his party over the West.

SEVERAL daily newspapers in New York are demanding that enough railroad trains be run Sundays to deliver their Sunday editions, despite the prohibitions of Sabbatarians. They will have these trains, they say, notwithstanding they foresee that their "request for proper mail facilities on Sunday will be resented by the Sabbatarians, who want the whole world to observe the first day of the week in their particular way."

EX-CONGRESSMAN HERR, of Michigan, spoke at the national services in the Auditorium at Asbury Park, N. J., on Sunday, the 6th. He attacked Darwin, declaring that that scientist hit wide of the mark in his theory on the evolution of man. Mr. Herr declared it his belief that at a not far distant time it would be demonstrated that the mind acts independently of the body, and when that time comes Darwin's theories would be worthless. He further said that when God saw the necessity for the ape he created it, though not as the ancestor of the human race. A letter was read from ex-President Harrison expressing sympathy for the work being accomplished at the national services. The ex-president's name was received with demonstrations of approval.

INGALLS says: "This day is balmy and sunshiny in comparison with the clouds and storms just ahead of us. The ultimate result will be redistribution of the assets of the country. The millionaire of to-day will occupy the pauper hut, and the pauper in the near future will ride in the chariot of the millionaire. The devastation of the yellow fever in the South was not near so disastrous as the situation in Colorado produced by the closing of the mines. Thousands of people are walking the streets of Denver. Like the lowly Nazarene, foxes have holes and birds of the air have nests, but the Colorado tramp hath not where to lay his head. On every street corner in Denver goes up the piteous cry for bread. In Wall street the piteous cry goes up for gold. When these two panicky conditions come together in the great Mississippi valley, chaos and anarchy will follow."

At the Christian Alliance camp-meeting at Old Orchard, Me., nearly two hundred persons personally testified to having been cured by faith, and twice as many more stood up at the close of the meeting when their leader, Dr. Simpson, asked all in the audience who had been healed by divine power to arise. Mrs. J. O. Thompson, of Portland, has been cured of a tumor, and Miss Jennie M. Benwick, of the same city, had seven teeth extracted without suffering pain. Mrs. F. C. Clark, of Tyngsboro, Mass., who suffered paralysis of the optic nerve, which nearly robbed her of her eyesight, was led to the campground, became anointed, and her sight was restored. Mrs. M. J. Clark, of New York, gave testimony that a few years ago she fell in a church door and broke her wrist. Neither medicine nor bandage was applied, but the Lord united the broken bones. Another New York lady said she was thrown from a carriage not long ago and her right ankle was dislocated. The Lord set the dislocated bone. The Rev. A. S. Orne, of Haverhill, Mass., said that for seven years he had employed no physician in his family. In that time one child had been cured of the croup and another of pneumonia without the use of medicine. An infant had died, but Mr. Orne declared that its death was due to a broken heart.

THE OLD ORTHODOX TEAM—WHAT WILL THEY DO TO BE SAVED?

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

Woman as an Annex.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enthralled every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Witchcraft in America.

Some persons are not greatly horrified by Christianity's persecutions of so-called witches, because they look on them as distant. These persons may be brought to a proper realization of those atrocities by learning that they were also committed here on our own soil, at a time scarcely anterior to that of our grandparents. They will be helped to a realization of them, too, by reading an account of them in detail. Accordingly we have been describing the witchcraft persecutions in America. The trial in Salem, Mass., was the theme in which we paused in our last issue.

In this trial, Sarah Osborn was the next who was given an examination, which ran in part thus:

"What evil spirit have you familiarity with?—None.

"Have you made no contract with the Devil?—No: I never saw the devil in my life.

"Sarah Good saith that it was you that hurt the children?—I do not know that the devil goeth about in my likeness to do any hurt.

"She . . . either saw, or dreamed that she saw, a thing like an Indian all black, which did pinch her in her neck, and pulled her by the back part of her head to the door of her house."

Other passages of the examination of this person, too long to be given here, illustrate, says the historian Upham, "the unfairness practiced by the examining magistrate. He took for granted, as we shall find to have been the case in all instances, the guilt of the prisoner, and endeavored to entangle her by leading questions, thus involving her in contradiction."

The third person examined was Tituba, a negress who in her former home, the West Indies, had become saturated with the wild superstitions which there fill the air. She confessed complicity with the devil. She also implicated the two women examined just previously, and on the word of this degraded and silly creature the white women were believed guilty and conveyed to jail. On the way thither Sarah Good "leaped off her horse three times" and "railed against the magistrates and endeavored to kill herself."

Next Martha Corey, a pious matron who had expressed dissent from the prevailing witchcraft notion, on account of that view fell under suspicion. The Christians of Salem were as forward to impute evil to whomsoever doubted their dogmas as we all find them around us nowadays. And also, in the words of the historian: "As she was a woman of notable piety, a professor of religion, and a member of the church, it was evident that her case, if she were proceeded against, would still more heighten the panic, and convulse the public mind. It would give ground for an idea which the managers of the affair desired to circulate, that the devil had succeeded in making inroads into the very heart of the church, and was bringing into confederacy with him aged and eminent church-members, who, under color of their profession, threatened to extend his influence to the overthrow of all religion." On the name of Martha Corey being buzzed about by the tongue of suspicion till it reached the ears of the affected children, these persons declared her one of their tormentors. Citizens repairing to her house to examine her were received with the pleasant smiles of an enlightened and courteous lady, and the words, "I know what you are come for; you are come to talk with me about being a witch, but I am none; I cannot help people's talking about me." The lady in the discourse that followed declared that "she did not think there were any witches." But upon her being fetched to the house of the children their tortures at once became exacerbated, and she was subjected to a more formal examination at the meeting-house. Part of this inquiry runs:

"Who is your God?—The God that made me.

"What is his name?—Jehovah.

"Do you know any other name?—God Almighty.

"Doth he tell you, that you pray to, that he is God Almighty?—Who do I worship but the God that made me?

"How many Gods are there?—One.

"How many persons?—Three."

In the midst of the questions, pressed with unfairness and uncharitable suspicion, the poor lady exclaimed, "Ye are all against me, and I cannot help it." Upham remarks: "It is almost amusing to see how the pride of the magistrates was touched, and their wrath kindled, by what she was reported to have said, 'that the magistrates' and ministers' eyes were blinded, and that she would open them.'" Her husband, Giles Corey, a firm believer in witchcraft, called to testify against her could not say anything very positive, but related two physical affections which had seized his ox and cat. On this Upham remarks: "It illustrates the state of the imagination prevailing among those who were carried away by the delusion. If an ox had a sprained muscle, or a cat a fit of indigestion, it was thought to be the work of an evil hand."

Rebecca Nurse, a matron of the highest character, was next accused. At her examination Mrs. Putnam went into a fit of what may be called insanity, which lasted many days. It was found that her fiercest convulsions could be allayed by the reading of a chapter of Revelation by Rev. Mr. Lawson. The next Sunday this preacher delivered a sermon suited to the dread crisis in which the neighborhood found itself. The text was Zech. iii, 2: "And the Lord said unto Satan, 'The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan.'" By statements from the Bible he confirmed the already amply believed doctrine of witchcraft, and distressfully exhorted to work against Satan, after this style:

"Satan exerts his malice mediately by employing some of mankind and other creatures. Thus he used the serpent in the first temptation (Gen. iii, 1). . . . He would deceive the very elect (Matt. xxiv, 24). . . . The Lord doth terrible things amongst us, by lengthening the chain of the roaring lion in an extraordinary manner, so that the Devil is come down in great wrath (Rev. xii, 12). . . . Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary the Devil goes about as a roaring lion, seeking whom amongst you he may distress, delude, and devour (1 Pet. v, 8). . . . Be ye very desolate, saith the Lord (Jer. ii, 12). . . . ARM, ARM, ARM! . . .

Approve yourselves a terror of and punishment to evil-doers (1 Pet. ii, 14). . . . The Lord Jesus suffered not the devils to speak, because they knew him (Mark i, 34)."

This sermon answered its end. It reinforced the powers that had begun their work. It spread out the whole doctrine of witchcraft in a methodical, elaborate, and most impressive form. It justified and commended everything that had been done, and everything that remained to be done. Under the supervision of a council of the most eminent divines of that and the neighboring towns, it was printed and scattered broadcast. Fantastic affections and illusions became numerous beyond our means of presentation in these pages. Accusations followed in so great number that our readers must be content to forego their details, and conceive of them by means of the sample cases already given. In April, 1692, by a council of the colonial government the affair was changed from a Salem one to one involving the whole colony of Massachusetts. The same inconsiderate haste to believe, and the same resentment toward whomsoever suggested doubt, that marked the cases already related, and that we find exhibited toward us by Christians daily, continued. The trial of Rebecca Nurse, for instance, was of such a character as to draw this remark from Upham: "There is no more disgraceful record in the judicial annals of the country than that which relates the trial of this excellent woman."

Executions now appear. Of their horrors one may judge from Upham's description of one, that of Rebecca Nurse: "In her old age, experiencing a full share of all the delicate infirmities which the instincts of humanity require to be treated with careful and reverent tenderness, she was ruthlessly snatched from the bosom of a loving family, . . . from the side of the devoted companion of her long life, from a home that was endeared by every grateful association and comfort; immured in the most wretched and crowded jails; kept loaded with irons and bound with cords for months; insulted and maligned at the preliminary examinations; outraged in her person by rough and unfeeling handling and scrutiny; and in her rights, by the most flagrant and detestable judicial oppression; carried to the meeting-house to receive the sentence of excommunication in a manner devised to harrow her most sacred sentiments; and finally carted through the streets by a route every foot of which must have been distressing to her infirm and enfeebled frame; made to ascend a rough and rocky path to the place of execution, and there consigned to the hangman."

The number of persons executed was twenty-seven. Those imprisoned numbered vastly more, and those who fled the country abandoning their possessions more yet. Giles Corey was pressed to death. Because of his refusal to plead guilty or not guilty, he was sentenced to be laid on his back on the dungeon floor, naked for the most part, with a board laid on him and weights piled on it sufficient to crush him gradually to death; no sustenance to be given him but on the first day three morsels of very poor bread, and on the second day three draughts of standing water, the nearest to be found by his prison door, this ministration to be repeated till he died. As his end approached, and his body yielded to the pressure, his tongue protruded from his mouth, and an official forced it back with his cane. This official is said by tradition to have been the pious Parris. Giles Corey was eighty years old.

The historian Upham, in the concluding and reviewing sentences of his work, while proclaiming belief in Christianity, deprecates the doctrine of witchcraft. He says:

"In the terrible consequences that resulted from the mischievous, and perhaps at the outset merely sporty, proceedings of the children in Mr. Parris's family, we have a striking illustration of the principle that no one can foretell, with respect either to himself or others, the extent of the suffering and injury that may be occasioned by the least departure from truth, or from the practice of deception."

Let, then, the full evil be seen of that volume, the Bible, which is one monstrous departure from truth, and that profession, the clerical, which consists solely of the practice of deception.

Another remark of Upham is:

"It may be that the air is full of spiritual beings, hovering about us; but all experience shows that no benefit can be derived from seeking their intervention to share with us the duties or the burdens of our present probation. The mischiefs that have flowed from the belief that they can operate upon human affairs, and from attempting to have dealings with them, have been illustrated in our narrative. Enlightened reflection, common sense, natural prudence, would seem to be sufficient to keep men from meddling at all with practices or countenancing notions, from which all history proclaims that no good has ever come, but incalculable evil flowed."

"For the conduct of life, while here in these bodies, we must confine our curiosity to fields of knowledge open to our natural and ordinary faculties, and embrace within the limits of the established condition of things. Our fathers filled their fancies with the visionary images of ghosts, demons, apparitions, and all other supposed forms and shadows of the invisible world; lent their ears to marvelous stories of communication with spirits; gave to supernatural tales of witchcraft and demonology a wondering credence, and allowed them to occupy their conversation, speculation, and reveries. They carried a belief of such things, and a proneness to indulge it, into their daily life, their literature, and the proceedings of tribunals, ecclesiastical and civil. The fearful results shrouded their annals in darkness and shame. Let those results forever stand conspicuous, beacon-monuments warning us, and coming generations, against superstition in every form."

To this let us add, that besides casting from us the notions of a multitude of subordinate spirits as Mr. Upham counsels, we must also, and it is of much more importance that we do, throw off the conceptions of those two paramount spirits, God and Satan; and indeed until we do the latter we cannot do the former.

We can do no better than conclude with another valuable thought from this historian of the Salem witchcraft. "One of the practical lessons," he reflects, "inculcated by the history that has now been related is, that no duty is more certain, none more important, than a free and fearless expression of opinion, by all persons, on all occasions. No wise or philosophic person would think of complaining of the diversities of sentiment it is likely to develop. Such diversities are the vital principle of free communities, and the only elements of popular intelligence. If the right to utter them is asserted by all and for all, tolerance is secured, and no inconvenience results. It is probable that there were many persons here in 1692 who doubted the propriety of the proceedings at their commencement, but who were afterward prevailed upon to fall into the current and swell the tide. If they had all discharged their duty to their country and their consciences by freely and boldly uttering their disapprobation and declaring their dissent, who can tell but that the whole tragedy might have been prevented? and, if it might, the blood of the innocent may be said, in one sense, to be upon their heads."

We have now, in occasional numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER during the last twelve months, given a history of the superstition of witchcraft that will be found, by such of our readers as have preserved their papers, more complete than any with which they have before been provided. We have recounted the pagan beginnings of scientific investigation of the phenomena of the air and of disease; the overthrow of these investigations by the rise of the Christian church proclaiming that these two departments of weather and disease are controlled by the devil and his agents; the elaboration of this doctrine, founded on scriptural texts, by each succeeding age of churchmen from the early fathers to the Catholic popes and Protestant Reformers; the decline of the superstition under the influence of science; and the persecutions severally in the Continent, in England, in Scotland, and in America.

The President Thinks That Public Officers Should Enforce Church Mandates.

We have been waiting since last May to see what remarks our readers would offer on a certain utterance of President Cleveland, which we gave in our News column. On the 19th of that month a body of commissioners and visitors of the Presbyterian general assembly at Washington, D. C., was received by President and Mrs. Cleveland at the White House. The speaker of the delegation said, among other things: "Let me congratulate you upon the fact that sturdy Presbyterians hedge you round about, and that the sturdiest Presbyterian of us all [Mrs. Cleveland] is at your side, a holy benediction to keep you straight to the faith of your ancestors." He concluded with an invitation to visit the assembly. The reply of the president was:

"I assure you it affords me much personal gratification to meet on this occasion the representatives of that great religious denomination which has done so much to make our people better and happier, and which is associated with so many tender and pleasing incidents of my individual experience."

Here Mr. Cleveland says that it affords him much personal gratification to meet a bevy of parsons. It does not afford gratification to a man of thorough knowledge, and right feelings, to do so. Such a man knows from history that preachers are a class injurious to the happiness of mankind, and consequently their presence does not excite in him agreeable sentiments. Mr. Cleveland's feelings may be right enough, but, we must regretfully say, we do not see how to avoid inferring that he is a person whose knowledge is not thorough.

Mr. Cleveland says, too, that the Presbyterian denomination "has done so much to make our people better and happier."

When the Presbyterian denomination had its greatest power the people were not better and happier but worse and unhappier. They have bettered only as the dominion of Presbyterianism has grown less pervasive and compelling. The chief magistrate of this nation ought not to be uninformed of this fact.

The Presbyterian denomination, the president goes on to declare, "is associated with many tender and pleasing incidents in" his "individual experience." This seems strange. In the case of a sound-headed man who has grown to be such out of a natural and healthy boyhood, religion is associated in the man's memory with incidents not at all tender and pleasing. It is associated with memories of hateful stillness and inaction enforced on the boy every seventh day; and of a highly unpleasant discovery gradually made by the man, that one of the most venerated institutions of the race is a fraud.

The president next said:

"The thought is also in my mind that, in the light of my public duties and responsibilities, there is a propriety in extending to you a welcome to this home of the nation's chief executive."

We differ flatly. We do not see what especial propriety there is in welcoming Presbyterian ministers to the home of the nation's chief executive. If there were such a propriety, it could spring from no other cause than that of the existence of some connection between church and state, some especial relation of ministers to the government of the people. But the purest American principles are hostile to such a connection or relation.

President Cleveland goes on to make clear his notions of the exceeding propriety of clergymen influencing government:

"We still profess to be a Christian people. This means that no public officer of high or low degree should be unmindful of the restraints of religious sentiment."

We shall not lay ourselves open to a charge of exaggerating if we reckon among "the restraints of religious sentiment" in this land the restraint of labor on that day whereon God forbade work; the restraint of worship of other than the Christian God, in accordance with the command, "Thou shalt have no other gods beside me;" the restraint upon scoffers at religion who would imperil the eternal happiness of our and our children's souls, etc. These restraints have ever characterized the course of religion; they have risen in regard as it has risen in regard, and fallen into comparative neglect as it has fallen into comparative neglect; and we believe that all will hold us justified in ranking them among the things meant as "the restraints of religious sentiment." Now, of these things, Mr. Cleveland says, "no public officer of high or low degree should be unmindful." If the officers are not to be unmindful of them they are to be mindful of them, and if they are to be mindful of them they are to enforce them; and so we have President Cleveland declaring that all public officers should enforce the Mosaic Sabbath law, and suppress worship other than that of the Christian God, and punish speech against that God, and so on.

This officer proceeds:

"It means that the religious teaching of our people should lead them to exact from those who make and execute their laws a recognition of these restraints. It means that the rules which a popular religious sense approves should underlie the performance of every public duty; and it means that those who assume to be religious teachers in this land where the people rule are related in responsibility to those in public station. You therefore will, I hope, permit me to say that though you do well to insist on the conscientious discharge of official obligations, and though you ought never to shrink from the exposure of official shortcomings, the contribution you owe toward accomplishing good government will not be fully made unless you teach the people by precept and example that they will find their safety and welfare in enforcing upon their public servants the observance of the mandates of Christianity and morality."

Each sentence of the above utterance might be commented on as those preceding were. But we will leave this task to our readers. The expressions are plain, and no difficulty stands in the way of understanding just what they mean. The deliverance, indeed, is remarkably bold, even for a president of this canting land. Let the reader take, for instance, the last sentence. It affirms that the people should enforce on their public servants the observance of the mandates of Christianity. Now, let the reader pause and gather from the commands of the founder of Christianity as recorded in the New Testament, and from the decisions of church councils and the declarations of church creeds, just what those mandates of Christianity are; and then let him imagine the officers of the United States government being compelled by a preacher-led populace into observing these mandates, and he will find himself in possession of a conception nothing less than astounding.

We do not criticize the utterance of Mr. Cleveland from any political bias. We are free from any such. We call Republican presidents as bad as Democratic. During the late Republican administration we directed upon the similar actions of the president and his postmaster-general remarks of equal disapprobation. We wish merely to have the people know accurately how each public officer stands, so that if by any rare chance they should ever be offered a choice between such a one and a candidate of sentiments more nearly secular and just, they may know which to choose.

When, where will the chair of the chief magistrate of this nation be adorned and glorified by the occupancy of a Thomas Paine or a Robert Ingersoll?

Why Make the Clergy an Exception?

A writer in a prominent English newspaper makes a good point. A woman was brought up in a London police court on a charge of having pretended to tell the future of certain persons from reading the lines of their hands. On this the correspondent of the Bradford Observer says: "It was a great humbug on her part, no doubt. I do not believe at all in fortune-tellers, whether they pretend to find knowledge in the stars, or in the bumps of one's head, or in the lines of one's hand, or in any other way. I will go a great deal further than that. When a minister of religion pretends to tell me what will happen in the next world to myself or my friends, I feel quite sure that he can not be quite sure. But I don't summon him in the police court for trying to impose on me. This is a very serious and solemn thing, and assuredly I do not want to make fun of it. But I should like to ask why the people who read the bumps of your head, or the palms of your hands, or the appearance of your face, should be brought up at the police court for fraud; whilst the man who speaks from a pulpit, and frightens money out of you in that way, by foretelling your future, goes free."

This is a way of looking at the matter which we commend to our friends. All the persons who make a living by telling one's fortune, or reading distant events, by mysterious means and often with the aid of spiritual beings or communications, may properly be thrown in one class. It is not logical to make an exception of any one division of the persons possessing the above general characteristics. Now, looking at the matter in this way, how monstrous seems it that one species of these persons, the Christian clergy, should be exempted from the penalties enforced against the rest of the varieties. These clergymen cannot give a shadow of proof that what they offer for sale as deliverances from a mystic world are more genuine than the similar wares of the astrologers, clairvoyants, and fortune-tellers of divers species whose arrest as swindlers is common, and under the law of this state may be procured by whomsoever wishes.

The secret of this strange spectacle is, one of these frauds once in the past became so powerful as to compel the government to lend it its support and make common cause with it, just as a big financial or public-works fraud does now.

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

We have received a letter postmarked Hartford, Conn., containing renewal of subscription, but no name signed to the letter. If the sender will send his name it will give us pleasure to make the proper credit.

In good condition, and with a fragrance all their own, a basket of Cape Jessamine buds were received here this week all the way from Houston, Texas, which goes several hundred miles at least to prove that Mr. M. V. Wright is correct in his claim that he can send them in that shape to any state in the Union. Several young ladies who read THE TRUTH SEEKER said the buds were awfully nice.

A scientific person once remarked that to get decent people into the world, reformers should begin with their grandmothers. There is a young man up at Dobbs Ferry—last name Brown, first unknown—who ought to be a pretty good fellow, for his grandmother is Mrs. R. G. Ingersoll. He is about a month old, and his father already regards him as quite an orator. We hope some privileged kodak fiend will invade the house soon and give us a picture of the colonel with both arms full of babes.

"At the many big religious camp-meetings held hereabouts and elsewhere this summer, some of which have been described in the Sun, there have been all the flushing fervor and overflowing rapture that there used to be at the camp-meetings held long ago in the times when Agnosticism was far less obstreperous than it is now. The Agnostics have not influenced the community nearly as much as some of them boast that they have."

The Sun will find, if it investigates, that the flushing fervor and overflowing rapture proceed from people who do not read and never heard of Agnosticism. There are a few of such left in the country. Revivals have no influence upon intelligent persons. The Agnostics have influenced the community to that extent, at least.

The judges who heard argument in the Clingman injunction suit as to closing the World's Fair Sundays, had not rendered their decision by last Sunday. Accordingly the directors, as on the Sunday before, opened the gates, under protest. No music or services of any kind were provided. A large part of the exhibits were veiled. The attendance was between fifteen and twenty thousand, and these persons were seen little elsewhere than in the Plaisance. The average attendance for the preceding week-days had been 128,695. Of all the exhibits contemplated by the American people this year, the most striking one is the exhibit of hateful tyranny and perniciousness made by the Christian church in keeping the masses from delighting and bettering themselves on the first day of each week.

A prominent Western lawyer writes as follows concerning Remsburg's "Lincoln": "It is a remarkable book. Judged from a lawyer's standpoint, as a defense of the charge that Abraham Lincoln was a Christian, it must rank with the most skillfully conducted cases of the century. Aside from the admirable disposition of the voluminous mass of testimony presented, for judicial fairness, subtle analysis, powerful reasoning, convincing argument, faultless logic, and conciseness of statement it is a masterpiece. The author possesses not only the elements of a great lawyer, but a great jurist. Every young lawyer should read and study this book. It will show him how a strong lawyer, starting out with an apparently hopeless case, fights his way inch by inch to a triumphant verdict."

The following is a copy of a placard that was displayed around Gallup, New Mexico. We have not heard how the sale panned out, but the stock in trade of a priest is pretty plainly indicated by the assets of the deceased man of God:

"ADMINISTRATOR'S SALE.—Public notice is hereby given that at 10 o'clock A.M. on Friday, the 14th day of July, 1893, at the parochial residence of Rev. Father Coudert at Bernadillo, N. M., we will sell at public auction to the highest bidder for cash all the wines, brandies, vinegars, settlings, tuns, tierces, vats, empty barrels, etc., now remaining unsold and belonging to the estate of the late Rev. Stephen Parisis. It consists partly of two or three ten-gallon kegs of native brandy, eighteen forty-gallon barrels of first-class white native wine, fifty-six barrels of red wine, vinegars, settlings, etc., of different grades and qualities; a large lot of empty barrels, kegs, etc.; a lot of bottled wine, etc. This is a first-class chance for persons needing any of these goods to secure a bargain. An effort will be made to sell all without reserve.—James H. Defouri, Anthony Fourchegu, administrators."

Mr. and Mrs. Dunbar, of Cincinnati, were recently bereaved of a babe. The Commercial Gazette of that place prints this letter received by them from Colonel Ingersoll:

"NEW YORK, July 19, 1893.

"MY DEAR MR. AND MRS. DUNBAR: Your sad telegram reached me yesterday. The sweet babe just touched life's shore and was then carried out to the great sea by the ebbing tide. I know how dark the world must be to you, standing in the shadows of so great a grief. How helpless we are. All we can do is to bear our burden and to hope. How pathetic our poor life is! The loving mother goes to the gates of death when her child is born, and when she hears the first feeble cry her heart aches with love—and then in a few hours this miracle, this divine babe goes back to sleep and death.

"And yet nothing can be done and nothing need be said—words are worthless. Time is the only comforter. You will become accustomed to your loss—while other pains and joys will fill your days. All I can say is that my sympathies are with you and that my heart is yours. There is, however, one consolation: The dead do not suffer.

"Hoping that you will bear your loss, and that you may live for many, many years, enriched with material love, I remain, Yours always, R. G. INGERSOLL."

There was witnessed in Camden, N. J., the other day, what the Camdenites, most of whom have not read "Crimes of Preachers," deemed a novel spectacle. It was a mingling of criminal and preacher, a translation from cell to pulpit. Rev. Geo. Le Count had been arrested several days ago for stealing washtubs, washboards, and other articles, and the evidence being clear, Justice Paul had sent the reverend gentleman to jail for thirty days. The Rev. George Washington appeared in court with a plea for Le Count's release. He represented that the prisoner was in great demand as a preacher at the East Camden camp-meeting of colored people. "Why should I release him?" queried the police justice. "Kase de good ob de public 'mand it, yo honah," replied Washington. "De Rebring Le Count am looked fo' ter preach at de camp-meetin', an' it may cause a heap o' damage ef he ain't dar." "You want me to let this bad man out to preach, do you?" demanded the judge. "Yessir; make it a fine, 'stead of jail, sah." "He has no money with which to pay a fine." "But yo honah, I'll g'arantee de fine; I'll see dat a c'lection is taking up, and dat de fine am paid outer de fust money, sah." The kindly but astonished justice, anxious to place no stumbling-block in the way of religious observance, allowed the preacher to go, exacting the promise that a $10.75 fine should be paid. The track being cleared, Religion proceeded on her way as oblivious of her supposed sister Morality as, except in the assertions of some churchmen, she has ever been since the world began.

At the Christian Alliance convention at the camp-ground at East Orchard, Maine, the other evening, a New York lady who had been in constant attendance at the meetings, but had of late taken no part in the services, approached the platform and told one of Dr. Simpson's elders that she was possessed of a devil which she wanted him to drive out. The elder called to his assistance several of the brethren and sisters for a season of special prayer. The applicant for the removal of the evil spirit knelt on the ground while the supplications were being offered in her behalf. Suddenly she began writhing and tossing and uttering incoherent exclamations. "Lord, cause the devil to come out of her," prayed the elder, echoed by those around him. "I won't come out," came in a piping voice from the woman's own lips, repeated again and again. The prayer was continued about a quarter of an hour, and then the elder and his assistants laid their hands upon the woman and repeated their plea for the devil to come out. As suddenly as she went into the tormented state the woman recovered from it, arose, rubbed her eyes, looked around, and declared the devil had been conquered. We have to remark on this incident that it was equally amusing and instructive. That it was amusing, the shaking sides of any man of sense who chanced to be a spectator could have left him no ground to deny. That it was instructive lay in the fact that it was a faithful rendering of one of the oldtime cases of demoniac possession and witchcraft, such as produced the fearful panics and persecutions. Silly old women called their nervous disturbances attacks by a devil, and silly old women of the other sex asseverated from the pulpit that this was so. Then, in the cases of olden time, the crazing of communities and the butchery of innocents would follow.

We desire to call the attention of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benefits of subscribing to the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. The yearly subscription is only $3, and subscribers to the Library receive a paper-bound copy of each book issued in it; or, if they desire the books in cloth binding, subscribers can remit the difference in price between paper and cloth binding, and get the books in the latter shape. So far this year subscribers to the Library have received "Paine Vindicated," by Colonel Ingersoll, price 15 cents; the "Creation of God," by Dr. Hartmann, price 50 cents; the "Resurrection of Jesus," by Don Allen, price 40 cents; "Crimes of Preachers," price 25 cents; the "Handbook of Freethought," by W. S. Bell, price 50 cents; "Religion a Curse," by S. P. Putnam, price 25 cents; "Design Argument Fallacies," price 15 cents; "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," price 25 cents, and "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian," price 50 cents. Other books besides are in preparation. One of these, we may mention, is "Pleasure and Progress," by A. M. Lorentz, LL.B., of which further notice will shortly be made. Send $3 and receive at once the books already published, and, as they appear, those which will be published between now and January, '94.

No One Knows What Matter Can Do.

For these many years have I been amused at the persistent efforts of Mr. Otto Wettstein to demolish his own consciousness, and wipe out spirit existence. It is amusing, because if he had made half the effort to obtain and observe some of the facts and evidences of the reality of spirit which he has made to oppose it, he might long ago have laid aside his weapons of destruction and been satisfied that he has been fighting a bigger phantom in his own mind than the anti-materialist idealism he is so constantly belaboring. He says:

"Idealism is Spiritualism. Until a spirit the shape of man is placed upon the dissecting-table of science and analyzed, the issue is still matter vs. nothing."

Now, while I readily agree that pure Idealism is a thing not to be defended as against the facts of material nature, and is a chimera of the overstrained minds of certain transcendentalists, I object that Idealism is Spiritualism, and hope to show our friend that the two are widely different subjects. Idealism depends on a system of mental ethics purely the results of speculation, a mental process of thought, founded on imagination and probably a false notion of physics, upon which all its deductions are made, but Spiritualism is founded upon the evidence of our senses in the observation of physical phenomena.

Otto Wettstein contends that the "underlying reality" is matter, because it appeals to our senses of feeling, hearing, tasting, smelling, and seeing, and because, too, though we, as individuals, were not here to exercise these senses, which are the result of the organization of material substances, yet external nature would go on just the same; and so has it gone on before we had an organized existence, to all of which I fully agree, and admit that natural phenomena have existed before men lived to witness them. And for the sake of the argument I will not dispute about the idea whether a spirit, or mind, existed independently of matter or not. Since he contends that the mind of man is the result of matter, and says that matter contains all the potentialities of life, and is adequate to all phenomena and all existence, we will argue the case and take him at his word. I believe that matter is real substance, and all there is of life, or spirit, or existence; but, my friend, this I believe also, that you have not yet defined every kind of matter. You have only defined such matter as becomes tangible to our ordinary senses. Then there are forces and potentialities related thereto, and connected with its phenomena, which your analysis has not reached, and of these I wish to speak, applying the evidence of my senses to them and their phenomena just as you have argued we must do to upset the idealism of the transcendentalist, and if I do this, you cannot accuse me of violating your own rules of reasoning from the effects of natural causes. Before I begin, however, I wish to say one word about the forces of nature. The sun, which you gave as an illustration, is throwing out its immense volumes of light and heat, acting upon our atmosphere, while the system of planetary motions go on and maintain the various bodies in their relative places by means of magnetic forces, attractive and repellant. These globes of real matter are millions and billions of miles apart, yet the forces, which are not matter, per se, no more than the tastes or colors are, are what is propelling matter and causing it to perform these wonderful revolutions through space. The globes are visible and tangible, but the forces are not. It is the invisible parts of material nature which exert the most potentiality. This should convince us that matter and the life of it are coexistent and coeternal, and that the tangible matter and the intangible and invisible force are all part and parcel of the same "underlying reality." And now for my argument based on phenomena which go to prove that a spirit man or woman can have an existence, and that an intelligent force can demonstrate such existence, addressing itself to our best judgment and reason.

Some time ago a meeting was held in Scranton, Pa., at which a young lady placed her finger-ends upon a small table, whereupon the table began to move about the room, and it was proposed that, if this movement was caused by a spirit, the said spirit should cause the table to go to any part of the room by the mental request of any person who might desire it. Accordingly, a gentleman was requested to test this proposition, and made a great number of mental requests for it to move and touch various members of the circle—which request was known only to the gentleman—and after many tests were made, each one proving correct, and the spirit never missing a single case, the gentleman then told what he had requested the table to do. It did not only go to the person he had mentally requested, but it did such things as standing on its two legs, rapping a certain number of times, and so on, as desired. The same was then tested by others in the party, to the entire satisfaction of everyone present. It was then proposed to have Mrs. Perry sit upon this frail table. She weighs about two hundred pounds, yet by the mere placing of the medium's fingers upon this stand it moved all around the room, and gently raised one side and slid her upon the floor. Then another and another got on, and was by this peculiar force propelled all over the place. This was an intelligent force, and akin to a human intelligence, and purported to be controlled by the spirits of my son and my brother. In this experiment we are judging by the evidence of our senses of hearing, seeing, feeling, and by the intelligence manifested to requests made. There was no idealism in the case, and it is a reasonable thing to believe that it was what it purported to be—viz., spirits.

A year ago I went to Onset, Mass., and called upon a person who was a slate-writing medium, and requested a sitting. The person had never seen me—in fact, it was our first meeting—and yet I got writing upon five slates, which I have now in my possession, as tangible evidences of spirit facts. On one of them my son and daughter wrote, the slate being completely covered with writing, and a large rose, which was painted in all the natural colors; and remember, that not a particle of any pencil or paint was placed between those slates. The spirits furnished their own materials—real stuff—with which they made them. These I have now as evidences of the facts of a force, intelligence, the mental characteristics of my departed son and daughter, signed Talbot and Mary. The rose was made as a special test to me, having been such a one as Talbot used to paint upon the panels of organs and pianos while he worked at his trade here, and he could have given me no better test of identity. Then I had writings from Blavatsky and others, and a slate full from Pythagoras, who related matters in reference to the precipitation of Blavatsky's picture, which I had witnessed in Philadelphia, Pa., a year before, furnishing incontestable proof of the facts of spirit power over matter.

Having witnessed such things for the last forty years as the movement of physical objects, even without human contact, and the manifestation of intelligence which could have come from no earthly source, and in many cases even seen the veritable spirits materialize and dematerialize in my presence while holding them by the hand, away from the medium or cabinet, and often without a cabinet, it seems to me to be somewhat laughable for Mr. Wettstein to tell me that Spiritualism is nothing else than Idealism, and as I have been depending entirely upon the evidence of my senses for the evidence of spirits thus received. But what reply does he make to such facts? Why, he simply offers no argument but the stale one of legerdemain, hallucination, deception, trickery, and fraud, and he will instead of patiently investigating for himself go on from year to year fighting the spooks, ghosts, hobgoblins, etc., on the ground that matter is a something and a spirit is a nothing, therefore it can't have an existence. He admits that matter can and does organize a man, and through it make a mind. That is, matter makes mind and is the underlying reality. Now, if it can organize out of the coarsest matter—such as bones, blood, muscle, fiber, tissue, nerves, etc.—a mind, why can it not organize out of the finer elements of the body and its forces a finer organism, such as a spirit, capable of withstanding the shock of dissolution, and adapted to exist in a state of infinitely finer and better relations? I ask this because I don't think anyone knows what matter can do. Matter cannot be destroyed; it may be changed and refined, but never lost. It always existed, never came from nothing, and can never be turned into nothing. Something never came from nothing, and something can never be forced into nothing. The mind and spirit body is composed from the most refined material elements of the natural body, and is destined to live in a sphere far above this material condition. Just as we had a preparatory existence in a little world before we came into this, in which the body, composed of hands, feet, ears, eyes, etc., was formed, together with all its senses, in a place where they could not have been used or exercised, so are we preparing a spiritual temple in this state to be used when we are advanced into the spiritual world into which we are going. And all the fine-spun theories will not prevent our passage to the world beyond, the evidences of which are plentiful to those who wish to be informed and are reasonable enough to understand themselves, and who are willing to receive the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth.

The Spiritualist depends on facts and the evidences of his own senses. He tests the truth of his knowledge by his understanding of phenomena as witnessed, and not upon anything so flimsy as an ideal hypothesis. He cares not what any man or set of men say, but he learns for himself and is convinced of its truths by facts adapted especially to his own case, and when convinced on such evidences, no ordinary argument on the elements of matter, or a denial of what can or cannot be done with matter, will have a feather's weight; and this is why a thorough Spiritualist cannot be changed by metaphysical or material argument. It is impossible for the Materialist to show what matter cannot do so it may organize into a spirit, and the facts prove it.

J. R. PERRY.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Aug. 14, 1893.

A Southerner on Lincoln and Mr. Remsburg's Book.

From the Charleston, S. C., News and Courier.

John E. Remsburg, of Atchison, Kan., has published a book of 336 pages to prove that Abraham Lincoln was not a Christian. It is issued as No. 32 Extra of the Truth Seeker Library, and while it is ostensibly meant to establish beyond further controversy a historical fact, it is really intended to aid the cause of Infidelity in the United States. In the preface the author says: "In proving Lincoln a disbeliever he does not presume to have proved Christianity false, or Free thought true; but he has shown that some Christians are not honest, and that an honest man may be a Freethinker."

Mr. Remsburg holds that in regard to a supreme being Mr. Lincoln entertained at times Agnostic and even Atheistic opinions, and that while he professed a sort of deistic belief during the later years of his life, he did not accept the Christian conception of deity. He did not believe in the Christian doctrine of the inspiration of the scriptures, nor in the divinity of Christ, nor in the doctrine of a special creation, nor in miracles or special providences, nor in the forgiveness of sin, nor in future rewards and punishments, nor in the freedom of the will, nor in the efficacy of prayer. He indorsed for the most part the criticisms of Thomas Paine on the Bible and Christianity, and accepted, to a great extent, the theological and humanitarian views of Theodore Parker. He wrote a book, which was suppressed, against the Bible and Christianity; "and he died, as he had lived, an unbeliever."

In the prosecution of his argument the author presents the testimony of 120 witnesses, twenty of whom say of their own personal knowledge of the man that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian, and one hundred of whom say of their equally intimate knowledge of the man that he was not a Christian. We are not impressed, however, by the force of Mr. Remsburg's reasoning. We do not think that he is fair in the presentation of the evidence or that he proves his case. For example, he quotes the account of an interview that the Hon. Newton Bateman had with Mr. Lincoln in 1860, in which Lincoln said: "I know there is a God, . . . I know I am right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God." Mr. Remsburg accepts Bateman's account of everything that was said at his interview with Mr. Lincoln except the clear and explicit statement of his religious faith. He adopts the eclectic form of treating this "testimony" by choosing what he wants to prove his point and rejecting the rest. Again, he quotes what Mrs. Lincoln, the president's wife, was reported by Colonel Lamont to have said in 1865, that "he never joined any church; he was a religious man always, I think, but was not a technical Christian;" and says that Mrs. Lincoln's denial of this testimony in 1874 was made when she was insane. He gets over the Bateman confession by saying that Bateman was a liar, and answers Mrs. Lincoln's statement by saying that she was crazy.

One of the principal witnesses on whom Mr. Remsburg relies is William H. Herndon, who was Mr. Lincoln's law partner for many years, and who has published a "Life of Lincoln," in which, it seems to us, he has collected everything that was particularly offensive in the career of his old friend. We really do not think that it makes much difference whether the Freethinkers think that Mr. Lincoln was a Christian or not—it is generally admitted that he was a great man; but if they would have his fellow-countrymen to follow him in what they call his unbelief why should they object to the imitation of his example in some other respects? We are told by Mr. Remsburg that "Abraham Lincoln stands to-day the greatest, purest, noblest character in human history," that "in the social relations of life he was the most exemplary man," and that "his rugged honesty" was a marked feature of his exalted character. We think that it can be demonstrated by the evidence of the witnesses who have been called by Mr. Remsburg to prove that Mr. Lincoln was not a Christian, that he was not pure or noble, that he was not an exemplary man in his social relations, and that he was not honest.

Colonel Lamon, one of Remsburg's witnesses, says that at an early age Mr. Lincoln began to attend the preachings round about him, principally at the Pigeon creek church, and that he was so much struck by a particular sermon he heard at Pigeon creek one Sunday that "he frequently reproduced it with nasal tones, rolling eyes, and all manner of droll aggravations, to the great delight of Nat Grigsby and the wild fellows whom Nat was able to assemble." It appears from this that Abe's associates were "the wild fellows whom Nat was able to assemble." There was nothing very pure or noble in this. Dennis Hanks, Mr. Lincoln's cousin, says: "Religious songs did not appear to suit him at all; but of profane and amorous ditties he knew the words of a vast number." Another was:

Hail Columbia, happy land!
If you ain't drunk, I'll be damned.

There does not seem to be anything gentle or pure or noble in that. A young man who found his most congenial company among "wild fellows" and who took especial delight in "profane and amorous ditties" could hardly be a very pure character or "a most exemplary man" in his social relations.

John Hall, a son of Mr. Lincoln's step-sister, Matilda, is introduced by Mr. Remsburg to prove that Mr. Lincoln made a specialty of preaching mock sermons and that "he prayed God to put stockings on the chickens' feet in winter." Mr. Herndon says in his "Life of Lincoln" that it was his custom to take off his shoes and pare his toenails in the parlor. Dr. Gardner, of Atlanta, Ill., another of Remsburg's witnesses, says: "When he [Lincoln] requested the prayers of his neighbors on leaving Springfield for Washington he said that a storm was coming and that he must have the support of the church." There was not much "honesty" in that.

We might continue indefinitely the quotations of what Mr. Remsburg's witnesses have said about the characteristics of Mr. Lincoln, but what good would it do? The point that we would make is that in trying to pull down Mr. Lincoln's character as a Christian Mr. Remsburg runs the risk of utterly destroying by the testimony of his own witnesses the character of Mr. Lincoln as an honest man, as a patriot, and as a gentleman. If Herndon is worthy of belief, Mr. Lincoln was the coarsest kind of a man; if the testimony of the twenty honest and upright men who have testified that he was a Christian be accepted, he was a great and good man, who served his country faithfully and lived without offense to God or man. We have very little at stake in this controversy, but we protest against the attempt of Mr. Remsburg to prove that Mr. Lincoln was a rank old sinner and a hypocrite as well, merely to establish the fact that he was not a saint.

Short Notes About Books.

"Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" by John E. Remsburg, is published in paper at 50 cents by the Truth Seeker Company of New York. It is an exhaustive review of the claims that Lincoln was a Christian, with the evidence in refutation of them. The Christian's claim is given in evident fairness and remarkable completeness, and the rebuttal is strong and convincing. Whatever conclusion one may reach, it is well to have in this convenient form a compendium of the evidence on both sides of this interesting controversy.—Chicago Times.

The 146-page pamphlet issued by the Truth Seeker Company, under the title "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," from the pen of Mr. Putnam, should be in the hands of every person visiting the World's Fair. It is written in a very entertaining manner, and describes the buildings, etc., which were visited upon a previously well-laid-out plan; and if the same plan be followed by readers and visitors they will no doubt see more and be vastly better pleased than if they go helter-skelter without a guide. The price of the pamphlet is 25 cents.—Secular Thought.

Dr. Hartmann, in his "Creation of God," goes to the very beginning of the earth and man, and settles all the vexed questions that have for thousands of years troubled this planet's inhabitants. In justice to the author, he makes out a more reasonable cause for man's existence than many theological authorities. Science and nature are the author's guides. Religion in all its phases, Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans are all alike to the doctor's views, and each is painted with a blackness that only an extremist such as the doctor could make use of. Dr. Hartmann holds the platform in a long talk with a good book that only theological giants can find flaws in.—The Newsman.

Whatever Mr. Putnam writes on, he writes on well. His Pen Pictures are original views of the great exhibit of the world's genius and labor set in poetic word frames that make them doubly attractive. One can almost "go to the Fair" by reading his little book, and we imagine that most that do go will not see as much as this volume contains, or see it in so rare a light. If you are going to the Fair this book will help you to appreciate its grandeur and beauty; if you are not going, it will bring the Fair to you. It is a magnificent artistic, literary, poetic, practical dish for a small sum. If you are hungry for facts, for fancy, for solid food or a dessert, it can be found in this volume.—Boston Investigator.

"A Handbook of Freethought" is a compilation by W. S. Bell, of San Francisco, containing in condensed and systematic form "a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity." Mr. Bell does not claim to have written any of this work himself; indeed, he claims only the labor of putting into compact and orderly form what he considers a large amount of irrefragable evidence against church superstitions. The matter herewith presented, he tells us, has been culled from some of the ablest writers living and dead. The author also states that he has often felt the need of such a book for his own use, and there are, no doubt, other people just like him. New York: The Truth Seeker Company.—Portland Oregonian.

The Gazetteer has received a copy of a book of about 150 pages entitled "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," by Samuel P. Putnam. Mr. Putnam has a national reputation as a poet and prose writer, as well as lecturer. His powers of description are equaled by few, and in this little book he tells the story of his tour through the wonderful White City in a way which holds the attention from start to finish. Mr. Putnam had plenty of time and two good eyes, and he saw the show in detail, not omitting the many unique exhibits in Midway Plaisance. Those who contemplate visiting the Fair should first read this little book, as it tells you what to see and where you will find it; also the prices of admission to the various side attractions, cost of living in Chicago, and other important information. If you have already been to the Fair this book will greatly interest you, as it carries you over the ground again and tells you of many things which you missed. It is in fact a complete guide-book, the best description of the Fair yet given, and the more valuable because reliable. To read it is the next best thing to visiting the Fair in person. The book is illustrated by many full-page pictures, including a map of Jackson park, bird's-eye view of the Fair grounds, and pictures of all the principal buildings. The book is sold at the low price of 25 cents, or five copies for $1. Address E. M. Macdonald, 28 Lafayette place, New York.—Denison, Tex., Gazetteer.

The religious convictions of Abraham Lincoln appear to trouble a good many people who have written tracts and pamphlets and brochures to prove that the martyr president was or was not a Spiritualist, and was or was not a Christian. All authorities from Lamon to Arnold and from Dr. Holland to Remsburg agree that Lincoln was a great and good man, but seem to gage his attainments and standard of goodness by the measure of his orthodoxy. If Dr. Holland was firmly of the opinion that Mr. Lincoln "had found God and rested on the eternal truth of God," Mr. Remsburg is equally firm in his conviction that he "proclaimed himself an infidel and died a disbeliever." And so the conflict rages. "Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?" is the title of Mr. John E. Remsburg's contribution to the controversy. He takes the negative of the proposition, and seeks to overthrow the clerical side. Inasmuch as the author has been toiling over this question for fifteen years, and accumulating a vast amount of testimony, it is evident that he considers it of paramount importance. He uses the language of Mrs. Lincoln, to the effect that Mr. Lincoln "had no hope, no faith, in the usual acceptance of those words," and he brings to his side other testimony from the president's family, law partners, members of the cabinet and personal friends, some of which is important, all of which is interesting. Clearly Mr. Remsburg has done his duty as he understands it, and has had the fairness to present at the outset the opposite view of the question. The book is published by The Truth Seeker Company.—New York World.

Evening Session, 7:30 P.M.

- Presiding officer, Capt. Robert C. Adams.
1. Address by Judge C. B. Waite.
2. Address by Clarence S. Darrow.

Friday, October 6th.

Delegates will assemble at the hall at 10 A.M., and proceed from there to the World's Fair in a body.

Saturday, October 7th.

Delegates will meet by appointment, and will be shown the various places of interest in and around the city of Chicago. Grand banquet and ball, commencing at 7:30 P.M.

Sunday, October 8th.

Addresses will be delivered throughout the day upon various Freethought topics by G. W. Foote, Charles Watts, L. K. Washburn, Samuel P. Putnam, John R. Charlesworth, T. B. Wakeman, J. D. Shaw, John E. Remsburg, Dr. J. L. York, Judge Waite, Mattie P. Krekel, Voltairine de Cleyre, Susan H. Wixon, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and others.

This program is subject to revision by the committee as the circumstances at the moment may demand, although they will endeavor to adhere as closely as possible to the outline given above. The hall will be handsomely decorated and no pains will be spared by all concerned in its management to make it successful in every way. This Congress is essentially a Congress of Freethinkers. The leaders of the Freethought movement both on this continent and in Europe will take part in the proceedings and great results are naturally expected. Delegates have written me from almost every state in the Union and from Europe also declaring their intention to be present at the Congress. We are consequently looking forward to large and enthusiastic meetings with crowded houses upon each and every session. We are securing the best talent the cause of Freethought affords.

The contributions still fall far short of the amount necessary to meet the expenses, so those intending to help the Congress financially I urge to do so at once.

The banquet on Saturday evening will be a grand and fitting climax to the educational exercises of the week, when with song, speech, and dance we can rejoice each with the other over the glorious victories we shall achieve. Bear in mind, friends, this is an eight-day Congress—the greatest of its kind ever inaugurated on the continent of America. It is truly worthy the support and consideration of all. I would say to every Freethinker who has not yet contributed to the Congress that now is the time to declare yourself. Delays are dangerous, especially at the present time. Therefore, let none delay. Strengthen the hands of your committee and put sufficient means at their disposal to insure a lasting success and benefit to our cause. Never put off until to-morrow what you can do to-day. By so doing your help, your sympathy, and donation may fall short of their purpose.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,

Sec. Committee of Arrangements.

345 W. Randolph st., Chicago, Ill.

News and Notes.

I arrived at Chicago Friday evening, August 11th, in time for the great Bohemian celebration on the following day. This was indeed a brilliant affair, and most people were surprised to find so many Bohemians in the country to make such a grand demonstration, equal to that of any nationality. There are about sixty-five thousand Bohemians in Chicago—the largest number of any European nationality with the exception of the German. They are among the most intelligent and patriotic of our people. They are thoroughly American, while they cherish the sublime and heroic memories of their native land.

It is estimated that there were twenty-five thousand in the procession. It took three hours for it to pass a given point. It was an animating spectacle. The Bohemian colors—white and red—mingled with our starry banner and noble strains of music filled the air and enthusiastic greetings waved along the glittering ranks.

After the procession many thousands thronged to the White City. Festival Hall was crowded to its utmost capacity, and one of the most brilliant concerts of the season was given in honor of the day. A magnificent address was delivered by Hon. Charles Jonas, lieutenant-governor of Wisconsin. He is an eloquent speaker and the vast audience was stirred by his vivid and picturesque exaltation of the genius of Bohemia and the liberty and glory of America.

The music was conducted by Dr. Antonin Dvorak, director of the National Conservatory of Music of America, and Prof. V. Hlavac, professor of music at the Imperial University in St. Petersburg. It was all Bohemian music. The Exposition orchestra of one hundred and fourteen men was present. After the overture came the songs, "Bohemian Chorale" and "Star-Spangled Banner," by the united Bohemian singers of Chicago. This was followed by one of Dvorak's own noble symphonies, and certainly the music of this symphony is not to be surpassed. The grandeur, the delicacy, the softness, the sweetness, the rippling melodies, the trumpet tones, the thunder strains, were like nature's own rhythmic splendors. The mountains and seas, the vast rivers, the fountains, the streams, the flowery expanses filled the mind's eye as the beautiful and majestic harmonies swept along. The "Slavonic Dances," known the world over, are enough to make the most sluggish trip the "light fantastic toe" and realize the "poetry of motion." It was like

The Dorian mood
Of flutes and soft recorders.

Not less beautiful it seemed to me was the music of Professor Hlavac, "The Chase" and "Mazurka." Both these eminent composers were greeted with salvos of applause. Flowers were showered upon them; an ovation was given of which an emperor might be proud. These great geniuses have a warm place in the hearts of their countrymen, and Bohemia may well exult in its preëminent position in the world of music to-day. Professor Hlavac is graceful, keen, superb. With every wave of his arm he brings forth exquisite music.

Dvorak walks onto the stage like a Hercules. Big and splendid he is, and what enthusiasm he kindles in that great orchestra, every string of which seems to vibrate with the intensity of the leader's spirit.

Dvorak is the most original composer of to-day. He is a student of nature. He is a realist in his beautiful art. He is like Thoreau in his naturalness. What Comenius is in philosophy, so is Dvorak in music. There is no artifice about him. He doesn't soar to heaven to find his melodies. He puts his ear to the earth, and in the earth he finds the loftiest rhythm. He himself says that "in the negro melodies we find a sure foundation for a national school of American music." Who that has listened to these beautiful melodies, sprung from our very soil, freighted with the tragedies and the hopes of a new world, has not felt that in these is the true music of our national career? Why should we imitate the old countries, when our very land itself throbs with strains that thrill in the rude and rhythmic songs of the plantation? In the folk-music of Bohemia Dvorak himself has found a wealth of material which will yet enchant the world.

After the festival of music over fifteen thousand spectators gathered in the arena of Stock Pavilion to witness the calisthenics and drill of the Bohemian American Gymnastic Union. The Bohemians are famous athletes. Men and women partake in the exercises and display a wonderful skill. Every move was the occasion for applause.

Bohemia is a quite remarkable nationality. It has amazing vitality. Crushed almost out of existence by the terrific Thirty Years' war; stripped of its independence; tens of thousands killed or sent into exile—it has yet recovered, not only its national spirit but its language even, and to-day in the Bohemian tongue there is a wealth of literature which gives promise of a surpassing future. The genius of Ireland, so brilliant, must to-day seek for expression in a language other than its own; Bohemia having passed through the same direful destruction, still maintains its native speech, and this speech is immortal in song and romance. The language of Bohemia is imperishable like the spirit of its people. Bohemia, like Ireland, is to-day struggling for home-rule, and every Bohemian in this country is in favor of that, and this great Bohemian day and magnificent demonstration means something in the politics of the world. The Bohemian exhibit is the most important in the Austrian section. As Governor Jonas says, "Bohemian garnets, Bohemian chinaware, Bohemian musical instruments, and, I may add, Bohemian beer, are not likely to be overlooked by any visitor to the White City."

In the Woman's Building are three hundred volumes of books written by Bohemian women.

The Bohemians were the first in central Europe to build a university—the University of Prague, which in the time of John Huss was attended by twenty thousand students. To-day ninety-five per cent of the Bohemian people can read and write.

There is a flavor of Oriental romance about Bohemia. There is something more antique in its art, music, folk-lore, than in any other nation. Somehow its people have preserved more of the original impulse of their Slavonic origin than the kindred races. Perhaps the oldest people in Europe, the Bohemians are destined yet to a long and brilliant future. Like unhappy Ireland, their genius is inextinguishable. In painting it gives to-day the masterpieces of Brozik; in music, Dvorak and Hlavac; in steam navigation, the great invention of Joseph Ressel.

So to me there has been a great deal of meaning in this notable gathering.

There is a Bohemian Freethought society in Chicago, and this will join with us in the International Congress, and T. B. Zedrubek, president of the society, will give an address. We hope also that Mr. J. J. Kral, who is one of the rising literary lights of American Bohemians, will speak upon our international platform.

I have had the pleasure of meeting with Thomas Capek, editor of the Bohemian Voice, a monthly journal published in English at Omaha, and which is doing excellent service to make known to Americans the Bohemia, not only of his time, but of to-day. Also I have met Mr. J. Vostrovsky, of San José, Cal., and his daughters, Miss Anna Vostrovsky and Miss Clara Vostrovsky, who are visiting the Fair. Also Mr. V. L. Vodica, of Omaha, a thorough radical, who has charge of a Bohemian colony to be established upon the fertile lands of northern Texas.

I have also visited the office of August Geringer, publisher of the Daily Sbornost and Weekly American, a Freethinker. This paper has a wide circulation, and a fine business establishment at 150 West 12th street. Mr. T. B. Zedrubek is on the editorial staff of this paper.

I also made the acquaintance of the brilliant young artist, E. V. Nadherny, on the staff of Le Monde Illustré, of Paris, and other foreign journals. He certainly has the knack of seeing things as they are, and there is a dash of vividness and accuracy in his pictures which I like. Of course there is no superstition about him.

There are five hundred thousand Bohemians in America. One-half of these are Catholic; the rest are Moravians, Protestants, and Liberals with all sorts of opinions. Ingersoll is a great favorite with the latter class, and his lectures are constantly translated into the Bohemian language. I also had the pleasure of meeting L. W. Kadlec, who was grand marshal of the Bohemian day.

The Bohemian Catholics have established a Catholic paper, published in the Bohemian language, whose particular purpose is to fight the Freethinkers. The very fact of this opposition shows the strength of Liberal ideas among these people.

We shall find strenuous allies among the Bohemians in the struggle for Liberty on this continent.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

The International Congress.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Give me space for these friendly words to each and every reader (subscriber or not) of your paper. They refer to the International Congress. They embrace three points.

The cause is in your hands, friends. What are you going to do for it? You are earnest, the call the worthiest. It is urgent. Decide quickly. You value your convictions, back them. Realize that what you now give has treble value. Whatever you can—none of us are too poor for this once—50 cents, $1, $2, $3, $5, $10—do it right off and 'tis done. Do it willingly.

At the other end, Mr. John R. Charlesworth, secretary committee, No. 345 W. Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., will receive and gladly acknowledge the attention.

Liberals everywhere, the occasion is here. Another mile-post in the vigorous life of Liberal thought has been reached. A success, an inspiration, it should undoubtedly be.

No more opportune time could present itself, mark it, for such a gathering as a means to greater, more far-reaching efforts.

Be present if you possibly can. It will help you. It will cheer others, thoughtful men and women—all workers.

If you cannot be there, show your interest in the work to be done and that you would like done. Write an encouraging word. It will take but five minutes. It is almost a duty you owe yourself. Think well of it. Do it, and do it now. It is far from a small matter, this.

It is well to bear it ever in mind, Liberals, it is the duty of each and all of us, so

To act that each to-morrow
Finds us farther than to-day.

That a Liberal poet said. That is the Liberals' oriflamme. That is progress.

The earnest Liberal cannot else be than in the van. He is used to stand the brunt of futile prejudice and coward customs. Never yet has Liberal thought led in vain. It compels humanity's betterment. This is worth working for.

The International Congress has its good work to do. Striving for universal enlightenment and liberty—the best use of this world—it calls for the best thought imbued with the unconquerable spirit of truth.

Friend, do your part. Do all you know how. All are expected to do no less.

"But man can do his duty"—simple, yet truly eloquent—said that grand Liberal, Charles Darwin. To the point, I bespeak your warm response.

Your fellow Liberal, LOUIS LEVINE.

P. S.—When sending a donation if you will mention this letter, Mr. Charlesworth will note amount. For every $100 subscribed in this way, I will contribute an additional $1. Do not let me off cheaply.

Keep this in view. The Congress will open its session at 10 A.M., Sunday, October 1st, at No. 517 West Madison street, continuing eight days. L. August 18, 1893.

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

The subscriptions for this book are indeed encouraging and generous.

L. K. Washburn writes:

I believe your work will be as valuable to us Freethinkers as anything we have in our libraries to-day.

Parker Pillsbury writes:

When your book is completed, so sure as I am on, not in, the planet, and am worth $5, that book shall be mine.

This good word comes from Susan H. Wixon:

Your proposed book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," will be the golden crown of your life-work. I am sure it will take its place with the standard literature of the world.

I can't help publishing Otto Wettstein's enthusiastic letter:

DEAR PUTNAM: You deserve success. Your last serial—now in pamphlet—is one of the grandest productions I have ever read, and should sell by the thousands; and I am sure your book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," will be the most appropriate and attractive souvenir of the Columbian year that could possibly be offered to the Liberal public. I trust our friends throughout the world will respond liberally in behalf of our Congress and yourself. Of course, I am a subscriber. May fortune bless you.

Henry Bird, president of Newark Liberal League, writes:

I invested a dollar a few days since in copies of your new book, "Religion a Curse," etc. I know I shall require many more copies, for it is a capital thing to drop into the hands of any thinking person who is not entirely lost to reason.

I find the harvest is getting riper and riper, and Freethought is gathering them in. I send check for your "square of Freethought," which will no doubt cover every side of the question.

My Pacific coast friend, A. Schell, says:

Of course, I would not neglect the opportunity of acquiring a work of so much importance.

Joseph Haigh, who wrote the song "Why Don't God Kill the Devil?" and now writes "The Devil Never Lies," gives us his heterodox blessing:

I will take your new book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I am sure it will be interesting reading—more so than all the years of the Dark Ages. Those who have read your letters in the Liberal papers know that you can write a good book.

T. Theo. Colwick, of Texas, writes:

I must have your book, and trust you will do ample justice to the subject.

And Charles T. Hayden, of Arizona, does the right thing:

Mrs. Sallie D. Hayden, my wife, desires to be a subscriber for your book. She is a better worker for Free-thought than I am, but depend on me for the reserve force. I send $5.

This is Woman's Day of course. The "Four Hundred Years" will be a record of woman's triumph.

My old friend, Wm. J. Jones, of Utah, is quite enthusiastic. He says:

If "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought" were written on sheets of gold, the writing would be worth more than the sheets. The three words on the badge you sent me, "Free-thought, Science, and Reason," are more to me than all the universe.

C. J. Curtis, of Pennsylvania, writes:

It will be something that can be understood—no myth and no miracle.

H. P. Marsh, author of the poem, "The Devil is Dead," etc., says:

I give my whole time, so far as my health permits, to preaching the gospel of humanity. I shall start toward Chicago in time for the Congress. I, as a Free-thinker and a soldier, want the book, "Four Hundred Years of Free-thought." A glorious record indeed.

Dr. Z. Coman, of Colorado, lifts the banner:

Put me down for the book. We will have a few dollars and a banner with a new design of Free-thought on it to send to the Convention. The design is my own and I want you to take a good look at it.

R. Butterfield reminds me of California times as he sends in his good word:

I may go to Chicago and be with you at the Congress. If I go, Mr. O. T. Davies will go also. Dr. Light, N. D. Goodell, Henry Fickler, and R. Butterfield were out to visit O. T. Davies on Sunday, July 16th. We had a glorious time, I assure you. Five old Antichristian associates were there. We only lacked our friend S. P. Putnam to fill the bill and return thanks for the royal feast set before us.

I wish I had been there, for I know what Mr. and Mrs. O. T. Davies can do in the way of California hospitality.

These are some of the letters I have received from all over the country. I have now over one hundred and sixty names on the list. I want to double it before Congress. I hope that every friend who thinks of taking the book will write to me at once about it. I want to begin the publication immediately, but I must have the guarantee of two hundred names before I can do so. This is no slight undertaking. It involves four months' hard work on my part at least, besides the expense of the publication itself. There is not a greater field for the portrayal of human effort than the last four centuries. The task is an inspiring one, and when I know that I am supported by two hundred Liberal comrades from Maine to California, I can labor with infinitely greater zest. There is nothing like companionship in what we do. I want to bring out all the wealth of Free-thought there is in these four hundred years, and to do so I must devote myself to the work without any anxiety as to the financial outcome.

With the splendid support I have already received I feel ample encouragement for the future; but now is the time that I need a solid assurance of success, and I want every friend who is going to help me, to send the cheering message at once. With two hundred strong it won't take a great while to make a regiment of co-workers, and a magnificent impulse will be given to Free-thought.

Address all communications after this to 17 South Curtis street, Chicago, Ill., or, if more convenient, send subscriptions to THE TRUTH SEEKER SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Dr. Holland's Failings.

In reading Mr. Remsburg's admirable book, "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" my attention was attracted to the expression which Dr. J. G. Holland made to an Illinois friend of Mr. Lincoln's, who informed him that the subject of his contemplated biography was not a Christian, and the less said about that matter the better: "Oh, never mind; I'll fix that." The readers of Scribner's Magazine will some of them remember an article written by Dr. Holland, the editor, in reference to an occurrence which took place in the city of New York, in which some of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER were interested.

Mr. Bennett had completed his term of imprisonment in Albany, and some of his friends had arranged to give him on his return to the city of his home a reception, which should testify to their faith in him as a good man and true. Many speakers were engaged, among them two women. One of them was myself; the late Hon. Elizur Wright was the chairman; the reception held in Chickering Hall, and an attendance so large that many were unable to gain admittance. Dr. Holland characterized the assemblage as an "apotheosis of dirt," said the women who allowed themselves to take part in that service would live to regret it as a blot upon their reputation. When the Magazine appeared Mr. Wright wrote to the editor, asking him to repudiate the article or sustain it with truthful reasons. Mr. Wright showed me the letter which he received in answer. It did not say "I'll fix it," but the doctor said, "Why, Mr. Wright, I have the highest respect for you, but we might differ somewhat in regard to giving a reception in such a case; but you know we editors never like to take back, or acknowledge ourselves mistaken in what we publish." I had been something of an admirer of Dr. Holland's publications, and had supposed him at least truthful; but this letter always comes to my memory when I see his name.

In the early days of the woman's rights discussions Dr. Holland was one of the editors of the Springfield Republican, and though he with other editors found a good deal to criticize in the agitation, he at that time gave a pleasant notice of a speech of mine in Springfield, a third of a column in that paper. Then it was the fashion to report anything that woman might say on the public platform in the most ridiculous manner. We were called "crowing hens," and our meetings "hen conventions."

Perhaps these little anecdotes will not much interest the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER, but some of us have grown so old that we live in reminiscences rather than in the events of the present.

Hoping that the coming Free-thought Convention may be a grand success, I am as ever yours, Syracuse, N. Y., Aug., 293. LUCY N. COLMAN.

R. M. Casey.

One more friend of Freedom has passed away. R. M. Casey died Aug. 12, 293. He has been sick for years, from running a splinter in his wrist. But his love of freedom never wavered and he labored to the last to help educate people out of old fables, myths, and creeds, and into facts, realities, and living truths.

His name as a contributor has been in our Liberal papers for many years.

He was postmaster at Five Forks, S. C., and succeeded in getting the name of his office changed to Bruno, thus scoring a grand point for Liberalism. One more of the old standard-bearers has gone from us. May his memory remain green in our hearts. Affectionately, AUNT ELMINA.

THERE are many hundred kinds of Christian religion. Each one is the only one that is right, and individuals of each would gladly murder and burn all the others for God's sake.

Lectures and Meetings.

PRELIMINARY to the International Congress, a series of meetings will be held at 517 W. Madison street (Henschel's Academy) during the month of September on Sunday evenings, under the auspices of the Chicago Secular Union, the Free-thought Federation, and the American Secular Union. On the first Sunday evening, September 3d, John R. Charlesworth will lecture; on September 10th, Samuel P. Putnam; on September 17th, Mrs. M. A. Freeman and Dr. Juliet Severance, and on September 24th President Beatty, of the Secular Union, and Judge Waite. The object of these meetings is to create an interest in the coming Congress. It is hoped that all visiting Liberals who cannot attend the Congress will make a special effort to attend these meetings. THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator will be for sale at these meetings, and Liberal books and pamphlets. It will be a splendid opportunity to cultivate acquaintance.

J. E. REMSBURG will lecture in Michigan during the month of September. His appointments as far as arranged are as follows:

Dorr,	Aug.	31	Gagetown,	Sept.	16, 17
Muskegon,	Sept.	1	Port Huron,		18
Ravenna,		2, 3	Rochester,		19
Hubbardston,		4	Northville,		20
Howard City,		5	Tipton,		21
Elk Rapids,		6, 7, 8	Mongo (Ind.),		22
Traverse City,		9, 10	La Grange ("),		23
Harriette,		11, 12, 13	Lawton,		24, 25
Mt. Pleasant,		14, 15	Benton Harbor,		26

MISS VOLTAIRINE DE CLEYRE will lecture for Friendship Liberal League, Philadelphia Hall, Broad and Wood streets, Sunday evening, 7:30 p.m., August 27th. Subject, "The Pope's New Encyclical to the World." Liberals throughout the vicinity are cordially invited to come and hear this very interesting lecture.—Geo. Longford, Secretary.

CHARLES WATTS will be in Montreal on the 26th. He expects to lecture there September 3d, at Toronto September 10th and 17th, and at Grand Rapids, Mich., September 24th. His address while in Toronto will be care Allan Woodhouse, 5 Wilton Crescent. We notice by the London Free-thinker that Mr. Foote will not visit us this year. He says: "I have now to state something with respect to the Chicago delegation. It will be obvious that the subscriptions received are far from sufficient to pay the expenses of two delegates to the International Free-thought Congress. Mr. Watts offers to stay in England, and do all he can for me in my absence, if I go to America myself; but, in the existing state of our party's affairs, my presence in England is the more necessary during the next few months. Circumstances are such at present, indeed, that I hardly think I could go to America even if I had a few hundred spare guineas jingling in my pocket. Some will perhaps say, 'Well, why have any delegation at all?' I answer that our American brethren have set their hearts on having a representation from England. Mr. Watts will go, therefore, and I may be able to meet the American Free-thinkers next year, or the year after."

WHEREVER Capt. R. C. Adams goes there will the banner of Free-thought be raised. This summer he is at Nelson, B. C., looking after mining and other property in which he is interested. The following, from the Kaslo-Slocan Examiner, tells the rest of the story: "A large and attentive audience gathered in the Hotel Slocan dining-room last Saturday evening to listen to Capt. Robert Adams's lecture on the subject of 'Modern Thought.' It was an impromptu meeting, the outgrowth of an argument which occurred in the lobby of the Hotel Slocan, when Mr. Adams volunteered to express his opinions on Free-thought publicly, and it became generally known throughout town that there would be a lecture in the hotel dining-room. The lecture was a clear, forceful presentation of the opinions of a learned, thoughtful scholar. The speaker argued from the most advanced theory of evolution, depicting the wonderful changes that had taken place since this world first assumed its globular form, contending that the old biblical theory of the world being made in six days could not possibly be correct, stating that the era of man in this world only occupied about 1-200 part of the world's existence. He quoted Darwin's theory of the evolution of man, and compared the embryo of man with the embryo of the world previous to man's inception; he referred to the Bible as 'an excellent collection of ancient literature,' and declared that 'ignorance is the source of all evil.' He asserted that owing to the teachings of the Bible men have become the slaves of two tyrants, the altar and the throne, and that the present agitations of capital and labor were due to that source. He said that the poverty of the many and the immense wealth of the few were attributes of the preaching of contentment and of superstition. Before taking his seat the speaker invited anyone that so desired to speak, as the question was open for discussion. A number of poignant questions were asked by the Rev. Martin, the Rev. Nettle, and others, all of which were answered more or less satisfactorily. The utmost good nature prevailed throughout, and when the meeting finally broke up everyone felt that they had benefited by being present."

Cannot Get Along Without His Helper in Seeking Truth.

COLFAX, WASH., Apr. 14, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $5 for my subscription for two years, as I could not get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is splendid. Three cheers for Heston.

Wishing you success, I remain yours truly, a solid Freethinker,

HIRAM HULL.

A Distributor of Literature.

ELKHART, Mo., May 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Send me "Mistakes of Moses," and "What Must We Do To Be Saved?" by the same author. Please send me with them a few of the lists of Ingersoll's works to distribute. I think many would get them if they knew where to send.

I am a Populist and a Freethinker, and I think a person cannot be the first long without being the second. E. E. LEBOW.

Anything to Uproot Orthodoxy.

TEXAS, MOH., July 3, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have taken your paper for over fifteen years, although I am an avowed Spiritualist. I find much truth and good sense, that feed my desire for historical facts. You are right as far as you go, but the phenomena of Spiritualism do occur. It cannot be denied. I think you know more about it than you tell the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Let everyone work in his or her proper channel. Anything to uproot orthodoxy of the present day—or as they should be called, a set of religious hogs.

Obituary.

NORTH COOS RIVER, ORE., Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: On Tuesday night, June 20, 1893, Mr. William Vincamp died at his home in Alleghany, on North Coos river. He was a kind friend to both Christians and Liberals, and being one of the oldest Liberals in this community his death is sincerely regretted by all. He had been for many years, and was at the time of his death, a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. His obsequies were conducted by W. W. R. Glenn, a constant reader of your paper and a staunch friend of the cause.

He leaves a widow and two sons, who have the heartfelt sympathy of friends in this their sad bereavement.

MISS MILLIE DISE.

The Truth Seeker in the Army.

FORT SILL, O. T., March 31, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: My TRUTH SEEKER of March 4th was lost, or rather misplaced, and got into Company C 13th Infantry mail. Some bigot got it, and not being satisfied to let others read it, threw it away. Some of the boys found it and were attracted by the picture on the first page. Several of them read "What I Know About God" and at once hunted up Joe Gunther—a staunch Infidel and subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER—for more "light on the subject." He and I gave them several books to read and have "opened the eyes" of two of them. So you see my lost number did more good than if I had got it myself.

Wishing you and THE TRUTH SEEKER success, I am,

Yours, etc.,

WILL C. GRAVES.

That Was Hard on Christianity.

CLARK, PA., July 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I sent you a postal order about the middle of June of $1.50, at the time thinking I might get a new subscriber to go in with me; but I have failed so far, so please to apply that $1.50 on THE TRUTH SEEKER and forward it to me for the next six months.

It makes me feel proud to hear that the stars and stripes, the flag of our country, are hung out to the breeze over the World's Fair on Sunday. I am one of the boys that helped to make that flag free. I served three years at the front in the late war in Company B, Seventy-sixth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and can say I feel proud over helping to set our flag free, and also over four million slaves we made free. That was rather hard on the Bible and Christianity. But down with the traitors and up with the stars and stripes is my motto until all is made free.

Yours most respectfully in Liberalism,
G. W. URMSON.

A Fine Society Doing Finely.

ELSINORE, CAL., July 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Since writing you of the formation of our Society of Science, Literature, and Art, we have made good progress. We have purchased a hall in Elsinore for $700 which cost not less than $3,000 in 1887. We had a great "boom" in Elsinore at that time and although Elsinore is located on the shores of the only lake in southern California and has 183 hot and cold mineral springs in the center of town, yet the reaction after the boom was so great that fine houses and lots can be bought for almost any price. The other day I saw a miner trade a buckskin broncho worth $20 to $30 for a house and lot, which was probably worth $1,500 or more during the boom days; a few days later he traded it for a span of desert mules and was happy. We get our hall on the building and loan plan. In other words, we pay a very small rent and at the end of seven years our hall is paid for.

W. F. Jamieson and wife are expected here in August to make their home with us on account of Mrs. Jamieson's health as well as their desire to live where there is a society of believers in science.

Wishes to Sell Freethought Works.

LEWISPORT, KY., July 4, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your paper of June 17th an advertisement of "Design Argument Fallacies," price fifteen cents. Inclosed is $1; please send me the worth of my $1, as you say it is the necessary thing.

On the 18th of June the Courier Journal had a discourse by Rabbi A. Moses on "Religion and Science." I hope you have seen it. A goodly number of my religious friends—some of them not over-religious—thought this rabbi had hit the mark exactly. I have never seen argument more fallacious. He did grind his ax well for Christian patronage, which he will get. The clergy are much in his interest, as well as he in theirs. It is a shame that one so well learned should prostitute himself for gain. He says, "the priests of Atheism." Where did he get this word Atheism? What is a rabbi good for? Nothing, like the priest—to keep the masses in a muddle. GEORGE SMITH.

P.S.—I am going to try my luck at selling this book for fifteen cents. If I succeed I will send again and again. It is the thing. Colonel Ingersoll's works and others can be sold, I think, in great numbers. G. S.

Believes in Hell, Heaven, and Devils.

SONORA, MEX., June 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have paid attention to the letter of Mr. Dugald McDonald, and if you will let me give you my opinion I will tell you with Thomas Paine: "Jesus Christ was a good and virtuous man," and now he does not make any evil, consequently I do not believe that he is the head devil according as the above-mentioned gentleman says. And yet I believe that there are a hell, a heaven, and a great many devils; but I believe that the hell is the superstition, ignorance, and fanaticism of men; the heaven is the liberty, freedom, and science; and the pope is the grand devil or the head devil; and all the priests and preachers are the little devils, for they have made and still are making a great mischief in the world. I do not think that they are trying to conquer this world of ours, to make it a world of devils in place of angels; but they have conquered it many centuries ago; this conquest took place when the Inquisition dominó and esclavizó a la humanidad; but fortunately for us that time is past, because in this century many a country has broken the chain of slavery with which religion has tied them, and there are many Freethinkers. I think that the best champions we have are the Truth Seeker Company and that of El Combate (journal of Freethought in Mexico). I think also that they are doing all they can to save the world from all these devils, and some day there shall be no religion in this world, and instead of church-houses we shall have only schools and colleges to worship science, liberty, and truth. Then everyone may say with Christ: "The kingdom of heaven has come." IGNACIO HERNANDEZ.

We Are So Meek That We Think It a Privilege to Get a Hearing.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., June 18, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: We wish to thank Rev. Mr. Wood for very kindly giving his permission to allow us to reply to his brother minister, Rev. Mr. Mucklow, through the Salina Union, of which J. C. Cobb is editor, because notwithstanding that Mr. Cobb is known as a gentleman of Liberal tendencies he would not have allowed a reply without the consent of the denomination to which Mr. Mucklow belonged, and that too when Mr. Mucklow had made an attack on the class of people to which we belong. In this case was not Mr. Cobb willing to submit to a censorship of the press with a vengeance?

And in order to test Mr. Cobb, inasmuch as Mr. Mucklow had made an attack through his columns on our class, we turned his right as it were and made a counter march or attack, which Mr. Cobb did not publish. Perhaps he failed to get Mr. Wood's permission again. What is called the secular press is supposed to be impartial to all classes, except what they announce as their platform of principles, and we will never get our rights until we insist on them or withdraw our support from such periodicals. What we want to do is to so conduct ourselves that the market will be overstocked with such weak-kneed sheets, then we will command respect. Liberals are as much to blame for this state of affairs as anybody. They, many of them, lack the backbone to insist on their right, and many of them pay $10 to the church where they pay $1 to the Liberal cause. How long at this ratio will it take for Liberals to accomplish equal and exact justice? Creep and crawl and the world will walk over you, stand stern and erect and it will sooner or later give you your share of the road.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

He Knows That the Universe Is the Revelation of God, but Does Not Know That the Bible Is.

NEW YORK, N. Y., July 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I expected before now to send one or two subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, but they have some excuse to offer, although they are able to pay. They are afraid to let it be known that they are Freethinkers. They say it is popular to be a Christian, a Roman Catholic, and a skeptic is despised—"although I believe," said one, "the almighty to be as nature represents him, and I do not and cannot believe in any creed or book which pretends to reveal his character as otherwise than merciful and good. The Christian churches declare that the Bible teaches, and they believe, or at least admit, that God in the future state will endlessly torment myriads of the creatures whom the suggestions of his own infinite wisdom and benevolence called into being. The character of the deity is wholly incompatible with the teachings of the book of nature. The books contradict each other, and therefore only one can be true. Now, I know the world to be the handiwork of the almighty, consequently I believe its teaching in preference to the inconsistent dogmas of a work whose claims to divine origin and authority are, to say the least, in my mind extremely questionable. This," said he, "is the principal reason for believing as I do."

And this, I fear, is the state of many minds. They are afraid of being known as Liberal Freethinkers. So you see it is difficult for one to obtain subscribers. The Liberal press has of late done a great deal of good in causing people to think and examine for themselves, and when the fashion of being a Christian leaves them they then will come out for Freethought and Liberal principles.

Hammer away, Mr. Editor, with THE TRUTH SEEKER. Our congregation are few, but they have reason and common sense in their brains, which will ultimately triumph.

Reason is the noblest attribute of man. It is this which raises him above the brute creation. Therefore we should never hesitate to employ it in our searches after truth. S. R. THORNE.

Sunday Persecution.

FORT WORTH, TEX., July 22, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I herein inclose a clipping from to-day's Gazette, which explains itself:

CAN A MAN SAVE HIS CORN ON SUNDAY?

A case was tried before Judge Johnson in the county court last week, which, from its nature, was of more than passing interest. It was that of the state of Texas vs. J. L. Crane, indicted for working on Sunday.

Mr. Crane is an attorney of this city, and has a farm some four or five miles out in the country. Work in the courts kept him busy during the spring, and when one Saturday afternoon, he took a run out to the farm, he found the cackles taking the corn and the ground hardening so fast it would soon be too late to work it. He shouldered a hoe and made the boys do the same and attacked the burrs on Sunday morning, working until about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, and saved the corn. The last grand jury indicted him for violating the Sabbath in so unholy a manner. On trial last week these facts were brought out, but the jury brought in a verdict of guilty, assessing a fine of $10. Judge Johnson set the verdict aside and dismissed the case, holding that the finding of the jury was contrary to the evidence and the law.

We live in a city where we can see a steeple in any direction rise from the earth as a monument on sacred grounds where hypocrisy congregates to thank the omnipotent absurdity that his dreaded disasters have been sent to heathen lands, and that his followers are still blessed with the privilege to persecute honest men. In case he is so kind as to remember his loved ones in this Christian land and send a deadly cyclone, his servants do not forget to drop on their knees and thank God that he has neglected them. They can subscribe $2.50 or $5, and see their names in the daily periodicals for two weeks. But for all that Judge Johnson (who I understand is a church-member) overruled the verdict and let the transgressor of God's holy laws go, and stood up like a man and decided in behalf of justice, reason, and humanity.

You will hear from me soon again in regard to some of the reverend gentlemen. I have a great many newspaper clippings of their misconduct in this vicinity, which I intend to mail you as soon as I write the explanations of them. T. L. FISHER.

Electricity Is God.

MT. TABOR, ORE., Aug. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have often heard the question, What is God or the ruling power? but have never heard it answered and supported by what I deem logical or reasonable argument. While I do not believe in any of the old Christian dogmas I do believe some of the writers of the Bible had some vague idea of what I believe to be the ruling power or God. I have a theory that I have never seen advanced, and would like to put it before the minds of thinking people. I know a great deal better how to do a hard day's work than I do to write an article for publication. Nevertheless I cannot but be zealous in the cause of Freedom and Progress. Hence this letter.

I believe Electricity to be the ruling power, and will endeavor to support my theory and show wherein it is hinted at in the Bible. In the beginning man made God in his own image; as he, man, was the highest type of life, men could not put God any higher for the simple reason they could not shape him. Here is their trinity, electricity the Father, time the Son, and space the Holy Ghost. All are without beginning or end. Hence, their three-headed, singular, plural, omnipotent, omnipresent God.

They felt the power of this electric God. They heard his voice in the thunder and saw his wrath in the lightning. He was there, a power, a something, and had to have shape. Electricity is in all and through all. Without it there could be no life. It holds all the planets in their respective places. In it we have heat, cold, light, and motive power. Through it we convey voice, matter, and expression of thought; light our streets; murder our criminals. We see the halo of light about the head and hands of magnetic healers and Spiritualist mediums. The land, sea, and air is one grand network of electric currents. Electricity connects everything in life. Every sound goes out and floats like the germs of life on this grand electric sea, and under certain circumstances can be reproduced. Electricity is almighty. It is God, the creator of all, yea, life itself. I can in my own vague way connect it with everything in the past and present. And I will trust to evolution and men of brains to look out for the future.

My wife and I both belong to the Secular Church of Portland, and we are doing what we can to do away with the Christian God and kill their devil. When that is done Progress will commence.

Yours for Truth and Progress,
J. B. Hoss.

Pleasant Dying Thoughts.

CHARLEVOIX, MICH., July 2, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I notice that my subscription expires on the 7th inst. You will find inclosed a post-office order for renewal, which if the United States mail is prompt will reach you in due time. I would like to be as punctual in paying as your very valuable paper has always been in its arrival. Your paper I cannot think of doing without, for it has for these many years been my consolation in sickness and my inspiration in health. In sickness, when I thought that the end was drawing near, I have been consoled by some of your correspondents' pictures of the peaceful and dreamless sleep that awaited me, or again by some others who from another point of view would portray the wonders and beauties of the spirit world, where the seasons will be one eternal June, and we on sunbeams will ride through space and return to earth at the call of some medium, where we will have a high old time, occasionally playing peekaboo from some mysterious cabinet in a darkened room. When I have felt the inconvenience of poverty I have been inspired by some one pointing to the good time coming, when the single-tax would do away with all poverty. Another one will knock out poverty by having the government issue direct to the people a certain amount of money per capita. Another, by knocking out government altogether and having a general divide-up. No more working for self-interest; all will be working for the general good and the welfare of others. I am too old to ever expect to see any of these glorious times, and I fear that unless those who preach these different fads begin to practice what they preach many generations will grow old and the good times be still in the distance. Nevertheless, the fact that we can denounce the government without fear of a dungeon, and ridicule religion without fear of the priest and his hereafter, are hopeful signs, and the glorious old TRUTH SEEKER affords such a fair field for a free intellectual fight, and so many able combatants avail themselves of the privilege, we can but say the world is advancing. We who stand back and take no part in the combat can say with the old farmer when his dog and the bear were fighting, "Good dog! good bear!"

ROBERT MILLER.

The American Protective Association.

SANDUSKY, O., July 29, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I see in your issue of today an article under the head of "Only Freethinkers Can Properly Oppose Sects." In this article there appear some mistakes, which you will allow me as one of this Association to correct.

You assert it is of Protestant composition. It is not, nor does it exclude Protestants. It admits every man, no matter what his creed may be, except Catholics. I am an outspoken Infidel, and live working member of Toledo Council No. 15. Any man who loves his (this) country, who gives his allegiance to it without any mental reservation, is welcome within its folds. No matter if he be Infidel, Agnostic, Materialist, or what not; if he loves our land, with its free schools and magnificent institutions of learning; if he is opposed to the church of Rome upon liberty of speech, press, and free education—he is virtually one of us, whether in our councils or not.

I cannot make this communication more complete than by appending the written principles of the A. P. A., and simply adding they now number about two million, and are having thousands of additions to their membership daily. The A. P. A. is a patriotic institution, solely and purely. Fraternally, DR. GEO. H. BOYD.

THE A. P. A. PRINCIPLES.

1. Nationality is not a bar to membership in the order. No man is asked where he was born.
2. We interfere with no man's partisan politics.
3. We attack no man's religion, so long as he does not attempt to make his religion an element of political power.
4. We unite to protect our country and its free institutions against the secret, intolerant, and aggressive efforts that are persistently being set forth by a certain religio-political organization to control the government of the United States and destroy our blood-bought civil and religious liberty.
5. We are in favor of preserving constitutional liberty and maintaining the government of the United States.
6. We regard all religio-political organizations as the enemies of civil and religious liberty.
7. It is in our opinion unwise and unsafe to appoint or elect to civil, political, or military office in this country men who owe supreme allegiance to any foreign king, potentate, or ecclesiastical power, and who are sworn to obey such power.
8. We are in favor of maintaining the principle of one general unsectarian free school organization, and will oppose all attempts to supplant it by any sectarian institution.
9. We are opposed to all attempts, local or national, to use public funds for any sectarian purpose.
10. We are in favor of laws taxing all church property.
11. We are in favor of changing our immigration laws in such manner that they will protect our citizen laborers from the evil influences of cheap pauper and criminal labor, which through the instrumentality of European propagandist societies, and in this country by the aid of strikes and the subtle influence of priests, are rapidly supplanting our free and educated American citizens in every line of industry.
12. We believe there should be an educational qualification to the elective franchise that will require every "American citizen" to be Americanized.
13. We are in favor of putting into office honest and true patriots, who are best qualified to fill the position, regardless of political parties.
14. We are willing to be governed by these principles in our future political action.
15. Our mission is to awaken the people of free America from their lethargy, indifference, and over-confidence. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty," yet the Protestants of this republic have ceased to be vigilant, and in conscious strength are either intently chasing the almighty dollar or quietly dozing, while we swiftly drift toward a more tremendous and terrible crisis than this country has yet known.

Proposes a Home for Aged Freethinkers.

ROCHESTER, N. Y., Aug. 3, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: From letters which have been in THE TRUTH SEEKER at intervals lately it seems that many of the friends are thinking it desirable to build a monument in honor of Colonel Ingersoll while he still lives. We have all of us been born, brought or dragged up, as the case may have been, under the dark shadow of Christian institutions, and each of us has been marked in a greater or lesser degree by its influence, hence the idea as to what the monument should be will be apt to take very different and opposite forms. I cannot see myself how the building of a stone or bronze monument, or even a Freethought university, could add to his fame, for he is already famous and has won for himself a glory of which no man or set of men can rob him. They cannot withdraw from circulation the books he has written or the lectures he has delivered. It might have been done in times past, but it is too late in the day now. With reference to universities, there are many things of much greater importance to us as Freethinkers than colleges of any kind. We should take these Christian institutions as examples when we can. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29th Miss Wixon says it is hard to be aged, feeble, and suffering. Pathetic cases of trial and pain are on every hand. Such being the case, and many of them in our own ranks, some of which we may know and others of which we know not, it seems as though we should be able to do something to alleviate such conditions, professing as we do to be not Christians but Humanitarians—and there is a wide distinction between the two. The Christians have what is called a home for the friendless, where an old lady who is able to pay $200 can be secure of a home the remainder of her life, under certain rules and restrictions. I think we might be able to do something in this line by building a home for old people in the West, as our friend Marcia Goff suggested. It might be for either single men or women, or for old married people who have no home, no one to soothe, comfort, or appreciate them for what they have done in the past. Many in the beginning of their loneliness might possess several hundred dollars, and in some cases more, which they doubtless would have been glad to invest in such a home, instead of being compelled to mope in a corner in the house of some person who did not want them, or closed up in some Christian institution subject to its restrictions and its requirements. I can see where such a home would be of great advantage to the cause of Freethought. It might be built large, convenient, and with all the modern improvements, without any nonsensical show about it. Many of the class of persons to whom I refer would be both able and willing to do much of the work which would be required themselves. I have been acquainted during the past sixty years with many Freethinkers. They all of them have been persons depending on the wage system or in some small way of business for a living, where the dread of failure is ever hanging over them like the sword of Damocles in this mad race of competition. Imagine the comfort the thoughts of such a home would be to such a class of persons who, when they could no longer keep up with the business procession, would rejoice to think a retreat had been provided for them, where the few hundreds or thousands they might have been able to acquire would secure for them a quiet home for the remainder of their lives among persons holding similar thoughts and feelings as themselves. To such an establishment might also be added a home for the orphan children of Freethinkers, where they would receive a good education free from superstition, and thus be prevented from becoming inmates of Catholic or Protestant protectories. Many parents have to suffer hours of unhappiness when those common occurrences of sickness or lack of employment overtake them, thinking what would become of their children should they have to die and leave them. I think there are very few fathers or mothers who would not be willing to make sacrifices if such were needed to assist in building up such an institution. The greatest good for the greatest number, and those who need it the most, is what we should ever bear in mind.

With much respect, I remain, as ever,
The friend of Justice and Freethought,
RUTH BRETTELL.

Thinks This Stock a Profitable Investment.

BOSTON, MASS., July 27, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have taken THE TRUTH SEEKER from its start, having previously, and some time after, taken the Boston Investigator.

I have written at various times, and you have published my articles—say in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 26, 1879, about "Sun Worship." And that same year I sent D. M. Bennett $13 to help him in his trial against what I thought to be unjust charges. You also published my articles Oct. 19, 1889, and Nov. 19, 1889, about "The Discovery of America," etc. You know me well enough. I would not give two cents for a clear title to the Christian heaven, signed by Jehovah, Jesus, and the Holy Ghost three in one. Lastly, I wrote about two months ago about the "Lone Star Cotton Picker," the office of which is at 31 Milk street, Boston, and the factory at Waco, Tex. Now, there are four and perhaps more so-called cotton-picking machines, and whichever one is the best as now made, or as improved in the near future, will make, in my opinion, enormous sums of money for the stockholders and the public. My principal reason for thinking that the Boston machine is the best, is on account of the remarkably efficient mechanism, which I have seen and examined, and I am sure it will do the work well, and not injure the cotton plant, which must be picked three times, as the plant grows from September to December. It was nothing against this company, but in my view rather favorable, when I was told that the president of the company, Col. E. J. Gurley, of Waco, Tex., was a planter, with six thousand acres of cotton land, and is a Freethinker, like Colonel Ingersoll or you and me. And when I saw the picture of the Wallis-Lispenard cotton-picker advertised in a whole page in the New York Sunday World about three or four weeks ago, and I had a detailed description of it from my correspondent in New York, I made up my mind that, although it would pick some in the field, it would injure the plant so much that in my opinion planters ordinarily would not allow it to be used in their fields except at the third picking in December, and that it never would be an economical machine. When I found by inspection of their circular, that the larger part of their principal officers and board of directors had Jewish names, it did not make it any more attractive to me.

A third machine which I have seen a picture of, with explanations, I did not judge to be any better than the Wallis-Lispenard machine. In fact, I would not buy stock in either of their companies on account of the faulty mechanism of their machines.

I wrote my first article, not to make any profit, but to let your subscribers have an inkling, so that each could make inquiry and investigation for himself as I did, and if they should buy at all, they could purchase with their eyes open and not at a mere venture. The cotton market is now so large and some machine in so great a demand that the owners of stock in what shall prove to be the best one will receive enormous dividends. I therefore would like to have the Truth Seeker Company own at least one share of the Lone Star Cotton Picker Company's stock. I will therefore contribute $2 toward the $10—the price of one share at par value. The New York machine preferred stock, par value $100, is offered at $85 per share. I would not give anything toward giving a share of that to the paper.

I am in fair condition financially, having say $2,000 laid up, with no debts, and I never failed in business. E. George & Co., 28 South street, New York, have known me for years.

If any subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER choose to send me $1 or $2 each to make up the sum, I will buy the share for the Truth Seeker Company and send it with the understanding that the company shall keep it at least three years, when I confidently expect it will pay much larger dividends than the ten per cent (stock) dividend it paid in January. If more than enough is contributed to give this share as above, then we will give Watson Heston a share, and after him one to Miss Wixon, of THE TRUTH SEEKER children's column. An object like this is much better than giving to a church.

As I expect the Lone Star Company will advance its price of shares in a month or so, in case they do so and the shares are not bought, I will repay the money (if any) sent to the contributors, or send it to the Truth Seeker Company, to be credited on their account.

The Lone Star Cotton Picker Company will have in the Texas exhibit in the World's Fair in Chicago, on the 1st of May next, a space of from thirty to fifty yards long to show how the cotton picker works. Every pleasant day during the Fair, at a specified time, the machine will pick precisely as in the fields the cotton from a long row of cotton plants placed in planks prepared for the purpose. Tens of thousands of these plants, with the cotton bolls on them, have been taken up and boxed, enough to last for a trial each day until the new crop comes in. Of course they will not sell the stock at the same price they do now.

Whether THE TRUTH SEEKER or Mr. Heston or Miss Wixon gets anything out of it, depends on whether you have any other subscribers who will contribute a fair share toward it or not.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

That Terrible Cyclone.

It was a hot, still summer day,
When everything was at rest;
Out in the field of fresh-mown hay
Are Robert and his guest.

They do not see the lowering cloud
That dips adown the west;
But are only talking of the crowd
Which meets on the sidehill crest.

Said Robert: "I take Gertrude Mundrane,
And lots of fun we'll have;
We will ride down the grassy lane
And will keep up quite a gab."

Said his guest, "I'll take Miss Fannie Hall—
She will meet me at the gate;
I never saw such a pretty gal—
But I must hurry or be late."

There is a crash of thunder,
The clouds roll, oh, so fast,
Boards and trees are torn asunder;
The boys think 'tis their last.

High in the air houses are seen—
Everything is in a whirl—
And there is a little dog so lean,
And Robert sees his girl.

In a moment 'tis over—
This terrible cyclone—
And the boys are safe in the city of Dover,
Where they had been blown.

Robert and Gertrude are happy,
For they are married to-day;
But the guest, he feels pretty flabby,
For his girl was blown away.

ELVA M. WILSON.

The True Story of Dog Duke.

A woodchuck by the wall lay dead,
"Beat for a beet," the gardener said.
The children come with curious eyes.
The growling dog would claim the prize;
Small ears, a dusky coat, large paws—
They stole a beet against the laws.
"He's ritty if he was alive,"
Says Madeline, whose years are five.
"I knew before," says little Nat,
"A woodchuck is some like a cat."
The gardener spoke—"Good-bye, old foe;
Your carcass in the ditch I'll throw."
"Oh, don't!" with sudden thought cried Jim,
"Like a true knight we'll bury him."

Jim rattled out his new green cart,
Dog Duke was ready for his part;
In captain's sash of gold and red
He proudly marched behind the dead.
Nat tooted on a shining horn,
And Jimmy was a whistler born;
The hymn was "John Brown's Body," and Maddie strewed daisies with each hand.
Yonder a lovely grave was made,
Thanks to the gardener and his spade.
So they, with honors nothing slight,
Buried the body out of sight;
Then stayed a monument to rear,
Duke acting well the overseer.

Next morning, out the garden gate—
Just where Sir Rodent met his fate—
Dog Duke barked, clawed, ran to and fro,
Capered in glee and would not go;
And when at last the children come
To find what means their playmate dumb,
Behold a neighbor's cat laid low,
Made ready for a funeral show!
"Bad dog," they cried, "what have you done?
Killed Pussy Gray to have more fun!
We do not like you. Go away.
There'll be no funeral here to-day."
The wondering brute, with look profound,
Walks disappointed from the ground.

LAVINIA S. GOODWIN.

Legend.—Continued.

"Do you pray?" inquired a miserly Christian of Seth.

Said Seth: "Those who put this question are generally cruel and selfish Christians, without compassion or sympathy, living in luxury, flinging hard speeches into the faces of the poor every time they meet them; blaming them fiercely for being poor and helpless; drawing them into some wretched corner to die, without a polite or lovely word to cheer them when the gates of joy should be opened to them. Every day the heart should be cheered by messages of Christian love and kind contributions, to prevent their sinking deep into an abyss of wretchedness and ruin."

"Behold he prayeth." Does he expect an imaginary god to alter the nature of things because imagination raises the heart above its natural level? Does he ask for radical changes, which are only brought about by disintegration and destruction? Is prayer a dynamic force in nature?

When men want changes they appeal to natural means, not supernatural power, with incantations, which are now relegated to the garret with the dream-book and horseshoe.

"You pray," said Seth, "to the God of Bible inspiration. Samuel the prophet was inspired and an Anarchist when he beat Agag, an Amalekite prince, to smithereens because he dressed sacrifices with cod liver oil, or made some other foolish mistake. These prophets were suppressed, or we should be surrounded with wonders at the present day. Human beings would be partially crazed, and at last disappear from the face of the earth." The lions were so mild that they never winked when Daniel raised his green umbrella. The spirit of prayer is supposed to be magnetic, and should bring blessings from the fertile God, who is supposed to resemble the goddess Diana. "Our God is full of fertility—" But this latter idea is left out from modern bibles. Baptism, with prayer, inspires people, and Rice, the great debater, remarks that conquerors had an enormous machine or squirt, which sprinkled thousands of prisoners. I know of wretched women now sick or torn to pieces by sewing-machines. But piety and prayer are not at their bedside; "they are found," croaked the raven, with harsh and threatening intonation, "at the springs, picnic, or seashore—perhaps at Chautauqua."

Correspondence.

NEWTON, MONT., July 29, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first letter to the Corner. My father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I like to read the Children's Corner. I am twelve years old, and I live on a farm. I have one sister and two brothers. There is no school here this summer. I like to go to school very much.

Well, I will close my letter for this time.
From your Liberal friend,
LORENA LOVERING.

JEANNETTE, PA., July 24, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: My first letter to the Children's Corner. I'm a Freethinker. I have three more brothers Freethinkers. My mother and father are Presbyterians, but they don't believe in preaching, but believe in the book called the Bible. There are too many nonsensicalities for me. I read the good paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER, and find it interesting; but not in the Bible. I like to read, but not nonsense. I would like one of our young Freethinkers to correspond with me.

Wishing THE TRUTH SEEKER the greatest success,
Your friend,
ALEX ADAMSON.

DELMONT, S. DAK., July 31, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: It is my first attempt to write to the Corner. I enjoy reading the Children's Corner very much, and am sorry when I see but few letters. I have one sister—her name is Nellie. She is fifteen years old. My brothers' names are Clarence and Ray.

I am twelve years old.
Pa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for about seventeen years, and thinks he could hardly do without it.

There are not many Freethinkers here. I was to church Sunday, but got tired, the preacher preached so long.

As my letter is getting lengthy, I must close. If this escapes the wastebasket, I will write again.

From your Liberal friend,

ELVA MAY WILSON.

P.S.—I have written a short piece of poetry, which I will send to you. It is my first attempt, and I hope you will print it.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A merchant put a sign of "Boy Wanted" in his window. The first applicant was an overgrown youth who inquired if he would do.

"No, you are too large. I want a cheap boy to run errands."

"I see," answered the youth, "you want a little one for a sent."

The merchant was so pleased with his wit that he gave him the place.—Detroit Free Press.

On last Sunday a little four-year-old had difficulty in spending the day properly. Not being allowed playthings she was restless and fretful, until finally she found her little toy iron and proceeded to amuse herself ironing her handkerchief.

"Don't you know that it is wrong to iron on Sunday?" reprovingly asked the mother when she discovered the child.

"Well," promptly rejoined the little girl, "don't you s'pose God knows this iron's cold?"—Columbus Dispatch.

"Say, mamma, is heaven beautifuller than Aunt May's parlor?"

"Oh! ever so much, Johnnie."

"Well, then, I don't want to go there."

"What! Why not?"

"Papa, didn't you tell mamma we must economize?"

"I did, my son."

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty, and the last chapter, of some 160 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America. Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

Price reduced from $1.75 to $1.00.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a young girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral. We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years absent

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right. Cloth, nuncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 80 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Li tionsness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abscon; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attitudes at Continency even more Rnious than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

Gems of Thought.

ON the 7th of December, 1484, Pope Innocent VIII. sent forth his bull "Summis Desiderantes." Of all documents ever issued from Rome, imperial or papal, this has doubtless, first and last, cost the greatest shedding of innocent blood. Yet no document was ever more clearly dictated by conscience. Inspired by the scriptural command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live," Pope Innocent exhorted the clergy of Germany to leave no means untried to detect sorcerers, and especially those who by evil weather destroy vineyards, gardens, meadows, and growing crops. These precepts were based upon various texts of scripture, especially upon the famous statement in the book of Job; and, to carry them out, witch-finding inquisitors were authorized by the pope to scour Europe.—Ex-President White of Cornell University.

VOLTAIRE was a man of humor, of good nature, of cheerfulness. He despised with all his heart the philosophy of Calvin, the creed of the somber, of the severe, of the unnatural. He pitied those who needed the aid of religion to be honest, to be cheerful. He had the courage to enjoy the present and the philosophy to bear what the future might bring. And yet for more than a hundred and fifty years the Christian world has fought this man and maligned his memory. Priests and ministers, bishops and exhorters, presiding elders and popes have filled the world with slanders, with calumnies about Voltaire. I am amazed that ministers will not or cannot tell the truth about an enemy of the church. As a matter of fact, for more than one thousand years, almost every pulpit has been a mint in which slanders were coined.—Ingersoll.

WHAT is likely to be the result of this general breaking up of old unities, systems, habits? An increase of insanity? By no means. Insanity proceeds from the opposite movement, from the involution of the mind upon itself, till fixed ideas can no longer be rectified by objective facts. The results will be good and bad: good, in encouraging inquiry and in substituting the love of truth for the love of consistency; bad, in discouraging a certain moral earnestness and enthusiasm which are the outgrowth of strong conviction, for the narrower is one's system of thought, the stronger often are one's convictions of its truth and importance. The extreme form of this union of prejudice and intensity we call fanaticism. If not in fanaticism, at least in enthusiasm, there is an element of good which we must not overlook. Men possessed with one idea are men of action. Enthusiasts carry forward great movements. The development of the intellect is the weakening of the will. Children and animals act out every thought. Education is a training in the inhibition of movements by the higher intellectual processes. The man of many-sided mind finds every volition "checked" by some antagonistic idea. The correction of mental bias, therefore, will result in a certain loss of spontaneity. But progress will not suffer. If we move more slowly, it will be more surely. What we lack in enthusiasm we shall make up in balance.—Professor Patrick on the Psychology of Prejudice.

IMPERFECT education fosters delusion; indeed, delusions are most rife with the ambitious condition which often comes from "a little learning," when the whole is liable to be assumed from the part; when a false appearance of truth may be mistaken for explanation; when the result of an erroneous observation, unchecked by scientific training, may be hastily considered to amount to demonstration. Education can have no more important aim than to equip pupils with the best known method for the recognition of truth. Every day of their lives they will have to decide as to the truth or falsity of some statement; and what is to prevent their going astray, if they have not been practiced in searching out all modifying circumstances of a problem, if they have not been accustomed to finding the balance of evidence, and taught the great lesson that judgment is not to be given rashly, but must be suspended when sufficient data to warrant a decision are not obtainable? The old studies of our schools do nothing toward training the young in examining evidence and forming judgments. The study of science, however, when rightly conducted, mainly consists of the process of investigation, the very instrument which pupils must be able to use handily in after life to save themselves from becoming the victims of impostors and swindlers. Aside from the material advantages involved, the habit of making truth the goal of his exertions inspires in the young learner a respect and fondness for truth for its own sake which cannot fail to have an elevating influence on his character.—Professor Youmans.

THE DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND:

An attempt to show that all Organic Beings are both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments.

By JAMES B. ALEXANDER.

Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,067 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid by us, only $2.75.

This work endeavors to embrace the field covered by thousands of books, such as those of the "Humboldt Library of Science," the "International Scientific Series," etc., by bringing together, in simple and direct form, with proper correspondence between them, all of the known factors contributing toward the origin and evolution of organic beings.

Do you wish to be well informed? THEN READ A CHAPTER OR VERSE DAILY FROM THIS BIBLE OF SCIENCE!

It is entertaining as well as enlightening, and will lead you to "worth-ship" (worship) nature — i. e., appreciate the worth of the Universal Mother.

You must own this book some day: why not NOW?

THE pope will shortly publish what is termed an important document with reference to the Washington University.

ON account of the prevalence of cholera in Italy, which is considerable, immigration to this country has been stopped.

A HUGE meteor having appeared and exploded at Norwalk, Conn., the superstitions there are conjecturing what great event it was sent to omen.

THE Ministerial Alliance of Denver, Col., has petitioned President Cleveland to appoint a national day of fasting and prayer that the people may be guided through the financial distress.

THE call for the Congress of Universal Religion at the World's Fair is being sent "to all those who believe in a divine order in the government of the world and who work and wait for the kingdom of God on earth."

THE pope in a reception given to Rev. W. E. Bartlett, of Baltimore, on the 17th, spoke affectionately of President Cleveland, and declared himself touched by the president's letter of congratulation forwarded through Cardinal Gibbons.

ERZY PIKBT, a twenty-two-year-old Polish girl, was found acting as if insane in New York streets. She told the policeman that she was a Christian, and a Jew wanted to marry her if she would change her faith. She said she liked the man and her religion about the same, and thinking over the matter hurts her head.

THE committee of arbitration to consider the difficulty between England and the United States over seals, which once bade fair to lead to war, has given its decision. This decision appears to satisfy all parties fairly well. The United States has substantially gained her important point, that the seals be protected.

CHOLERA reports from the Russian provinces for last week are: Podolia, 484 cases, 175 deaths; Orel, 327 cases, 110 deaths; Don region, 254 cases, 147 deaths; Kieff, 290 cases, 91 deaths; Grodno, 110 cases, 27 deaths; Nijni Novgorod, 258 cases, 102 deaths; Kherson, 50 cases, 10 deaths; Yaroslav, 39 cases, 15 deaths; Samara, 31 cases, 8 deaths; Vladimir, 23 cases, 5 deaths; Kazan, 30 cases, 13 deaths; Moscow, 57 cases, 24 deaths.

IN South Carolina "blind tigers," or illicit liquor saloons, exist abundantly. Despite Governor Tillman's threats to enforce the law only one raid has been made, and the offender there has been freed on bail and will not be tried for some time. The state has been able to introduce few of its dispensaries, and secures little revenue. The decisions of the courts on the constitutionality of the law have already become hopelessly tangled, and presage endless litigation.

CURRENCY is very scarce. In New York city it commands a premium of three per cent. In consequence, there is a tendency to dishonor a good deal of commercial paper. Some firms are failing. Banks are in difficulties; but while many have demanded time in which to meet demands, few have failed. There is a prediction, which however is not generally believed, of a disastrous general panic and failure, followed by the throwing of workingmen out of employment.

SEVERAL passages of the latest speech of M. Clemenceau in the Paris election have become famous. Among them is one where, after referring to the Monarchist party as nearly dead, he says: "What is living, though, and very powerful, is the Catholic church, the greatest organized political force in existence. The pope sees from afar. The pope is in no hurry. Serving only one interest—that of the church, disposing of a conservative force without limit, he knows well how to bend to his yoke Conservatives of every hue. How far will he go? It would be rash to say. Perhaps far, always asking for toleration, always working for domination."

THE pope has received from Cardinal Gibbons a letter written to that prelate by President Cleveland. The president requests the transmission to the pope of his congratulations on the latter's golden jubilee. Speaking of the friendly sentiments of the pope for the United States, he says: "I am glad to believe that these sentiments are the natural outgrowth of the Holy Father's solicitude for the welfare and happiness of the masses of humanity, and his especial sympathy for every effort made to dignify simple manhood and to promote the moral and social elevation of those who toil. The kindness with which His Holiness lately accepted a copy of the Constitution of the United States leads me to suggest that, if it does not seem presumptuous, it would please me exceedingly to place in his hands a book containing the official papers and documents written by me during my previous term of office."

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Rensburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Rensburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. H. Land, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Rensburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced a degradation of sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on the Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them in more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pioneers, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was a sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

We Must Observe Genuin, Not Diluted Religion.

Some persons say that religion does not deserve to be so vehemently blamed and fought, for, say they, when we look about us we do not find it doing very bad things—do not find it doing the dreadful things that Infidels are always charging against it. But to these persons it should be pointed out, that what they see about them as religion, in this country and this age, is not religion. That is, it is not religion pure and genuin. It is not religion ungoverned by other forces, and allowed to hav its own way and act out its inmost nature. What they see about them is not religion, but a compound of religion and science. Or we may say, a compound of religion and common sense. In this land and age science and common sense hav won a considerable prevalence, and penetrating the minds even of those who suppose themselves the most orthodox religionists, cause them to forego the most conspicuously absurd or injurious acts to which their faith would impel them.

The persons who would apologize for religion should first get a good idea of what that system is. They can never do this by inspecting this land, or the most of Europe, in the present age. They must turn their glance to other lands or ages. They must turn it either to other ages of Europe and America, or to other countries in the present age. In the histories of Europe and America a few generations ago they may contemplate religion as it behaves when it gets full possession, or in Russia, Asia, Africa, etc., of the present day they may contemplate it as it behaves when it gets full possession.

In order that real religion may thus be observed, we frequently depict some case of its prevalence either of old, or now in foreign lands. We will in this article ask the reader's attention to an instance of it and its workings in India. The city of Bombay has a population of over seven hundred thousand, more than half of whom are Hindoos. The Mohammedans are the next most important nativ element numbering over one hundred and fifty thousand, the rest of the nativ inhabitants being Parsees, Buddhists, and Jains. Although not the most numerous the Mohammedans are the most fanatical, portion of the inhabitants of Bombay, and are always finding pretexts of one kind or another for quarreling with the other religious sects. A little more than a year ago they found an excuse for making a disturbance in the fact that a Parsee theatrical company intended to produce a play in which the person and character of Khaleefa, one of the successors of the Prophet, were to be represented. On the eve of the proposed performance a general excitement prevailed throughout the Mohammedan quarters of the city, and a riot would hav ensued had not the police induced the proprietor of the theater to abandon his project. Immediately afterward the Mohammedans addressed a petition to the government of the presidency setting forth that the proposed performance would hurt their religious feelings, and they cited the fact not long previously, both in London and Paris, on objections raised by the Turkish ambassador, the performance of a play in which Mohammed was brought on the stage was prevented. It has frequently happened that the Mohammedans hav publicly killed a cow, which is a sacred beast according to the Hindoo religion, in order to exasperate the Hindoos. The common retaliation has been to kill a pig and throw it into a mosque. This the Mohammedans regard as the grossest defilement.

Leaving this past history, we will come to an outbreak of religious hostility which began, on the 11th of Augnst and has been repeated at intervals ever since. This trouble had been brewing since the latter part of June, when some Mohammedans slaughtered a few cows, exciting the wrath of the Hindoos, who hold cows sacred. They retaliated by killing pigs and throwing the carcasses into the mosques, a defiling of those places of worship which no Mohammedan can endure. On July 3d the Hindoos held a great meeting in the cloth market to consider the situation. They were inflamed by the speeches of the jogis made there, and the result has been offense and counter-offense ever since, with growing fury. The mullatis and the jogis hav been urging on their respectiv followers to a holy war of extermination. On the 11th the Mohammedans were observing one of the festivals commanded by the Koran, while the Hindoos were also taking part in celebrating a day set apart for religious observance. The consequence was that religious feeling was high on both sides and it took but little to cause the men who were at first involved in the dispute to come to blows. The number of rioters grew rapidly, and when some of the Mohammedans proposed to capture one of the holy Hindoo temples they found plenty to aid them in the attempt. Howling and yelling "Allah il Allah!" the Mohammedans rushed to the temple. But the priests, aided by hundreds of Hindoos, fought desperately against the desecration of the building, and finally succeeded in driving off the assailants. The fighting was continued in the vicinity, and finally the authorities were compelled to call out the troops to restore order, which was done after considerable trouble. The rioting was general in the business part of the city, and during its continuance traffic was entirely stopped. Since this first outbreak there has been a repetition of the scene every few days. Some of the conflicts hav resulted in a large number of deaths, and the hospitals are filled with the wounded. The mosques, or churches of the Mohammedans, hav been an especial object of attack, and several hav been destroyed. Those remaining are being protected by heavy equipments of artillery. Shops are closed, and every train leaving the city is filled with families returning to their nativ districts for safety in the event of general trouble. The working people refuse to resume their labor. One of the greatest massacres in history is threatened, if it has not already begun. The force at Great Britain's command is said to be entirely inadequate to cope with such an emergency. It is said that only three thousand troops are within easy distance of Bombay. The religious fury has seized not only the natives in that city, but in the whole province, where the population is sixteen millions. It has spread also to other parts of India.

This kind of doings always prevails when religion is thoroughly believed. It prevailed among all the Christian peoples when they fully believed. It would prevail here now if it were not that Infidels and scientists hav filled the air with doubt of the faith.

But the clergy want to hav this doubt totally abolished. They want the people to believe Christianity with the same full assurance as of old. This is equivalent to saying that they want religious warfare to prevail in Christendom as of old. Down with them!

What the Foundation of Morality Really Is.

Christians say that Freethinkers hav no "foundation" for morality. However, reflect upon what is meant by this word, foundation. The idea that will rise into most minds to correspond to this word will be the idea of a command. Most minds, if attentiv to their thoughts, will perceive a vague sense of the necessity of a ruler, a superior, issuing a command. Why will most hav such an idea? Simply because Christianity has during centuries got man accustomed to the feeling that he must look, for the ultimate source of authority, to some person. This was the tendency of all in the childhood of humanity, and Christianity has kept them in the habit. To look up to some arbitrary, despotic personality, king, priest, or god, and obey his commands—this is all that religion has ever taught mankind.

But science has in these later days discovered a different source of moral authority, a different foundation of the moral feeling, and the true one. Evolution, in tracing back the course of man's development from lower orders, has discovered how all the others of man's faculties took their rise; naturally it has also discovered how the moral sense took its rise. The lower animals hav a certain moral sense, and out of this the stronger moral sense of man took its rise through what is called "the association of ideas." Our ideas and feelings all run into one another, one merging into another connected idea or feeling so that when it is present the other is aroused too. Then if a certain class of actions be usually followed by painful outer consequences, it will presently come about that an indissoluble connection will hav been formed, in one's mental associations, between the ideas of those actions and the painful feelings of their consequences. The ideas of those actions will immediately upon rising in the mind produce feelings of pain and abhorrence, whether the consequences follow or not. It only remains to ascertain, then, whether the actions detrimental to others are followed by painful outer consequences, and upon finding that they are, we shall hav found the source of that painful and repugnant feeling that accompanies the ideas of acts detrimental to others. One set of such painful consequences is easily found. It consists of the effects which society has made to follow such acts in punishment by law, in punishment by condemnatory social opinion, and in general hindrance to one's business designs and material prospects. Another set of painful consequences is not so easily found. It lies in the sympathies, in the imagination. The law of association in its simplest form being that: Any state of mind which reproduces an element entering into some previous state, tends to reproduce the whole of that previous state, it follows that upon seeing in a fellow-being outward manifestations of suffering, these being elements which entered into a previous state of suffering in ourselves, there is a tendency to reproduction of the whole of that previous state of suffering in ourselves. Such is the nature of sympathy, of pity.

It is the mental associations formed upon these two sets of consequences that mainly constitute what we call our moral sense, our conscience.

Then when we observe how the development of this sense has been accelerated by the struggle for survival of competing tribes or groups of men, those deficient in it being necessarily deficient in cohesion and in prosperity, and being supplanted by those possessing it in greater strength, we get a hasty view of the causes of the highly developed moral feeling of to-day.

Thus any who have been accustomed, with Christians, to think in a vague way that moral authority must issue from the command of some personal being, need not be at a loss at the removal of that being. The "foundation" of the moral sense is the same as that of anything else. The "foundation" of any mental faculty is simply, that it is. Christians might as well select any faculty of the intellect that we see working and producing results around us and say that it cannot exist longer, as it "has no foundation." "In a universe of collected facts," say Christians, "there is found no ought." We reply that in a universe of collected facts there is found an ought. That universe of collected facts must include the facts of psychology, the science of mind, and when we come to inspect the facts of psychology we find among them the fact of a faculty of the human disposition that pronounces oughts and impels man to conform to them, and has through all ages. So when a Christian talks about there being, except as consequent upon divine direction, no moral impelling force, no ought, in the human disposition, the reply to be made is simply that, there is, just as much as there is each intellectual faculty, each faculty of every other kind, without being consequent upon divine determination.

Theologians Finding Out What the Bible Is.

It is known to most Freethinkers that the work of investigating and making public the true character of the Bible, which was begun by members of their own party, is now being carried on to a large extent by Christians themselves. Among the professors in theological seminaries and other persons skilled in biblical knowledge, those ones who are honest and courageous have come out with the truth that the Bible is not at all what it used to be thought, and are elaborating their proofs that it is not, in great detail, for the eyes of the world. We should not, however, characterize these men as "honest and courageous" without qualification; we mean, partly so; if they were completely honest and courageous they would go farther and take the stand of the out-and-out Infidel.

The work of these persons is what is called "the higher criticism." That from which it is distinguished is the old traditional criticism. The old criticism, under which we were born and bred, insisted that the scripture was perfect, without inconsistency or error; and taught popularly that the authorship of the several books was plain and assured, each being written by the person whose name it bears. On the other hand, the new or higher criticism regretfully but firmly announces that it has found the scripture imperfect, full of inconsistency and error; and that the authorship of the several books is doubtful or unknown, they not being by any means written by the persons whose names they bear.

But these exponents of the higher criticism still say, after finding out all these things about the Bible, that that book still contains the divine word in some way or other. When pinned down to answer just how this can be, they give replies extremely vague and unsatisfactory. The truth is, they really believe the Bible divine no more than did Thomas Paine their predecessor. Some of them refrain from proclaiming this unbelief through the mistaken notion that religion must be maintained as necessary to morality. These persons it is our aim, in our frequent articles here, to disabuse of this error. Others are deterred, it is to be imagined, through the notion that society's change from religion to irreligion, though inevitable, must be made gradually. This is nonsense; the more speedy and sweeping the change the better. Still others are, we fear, actuated by a selfish desire to retain their positions.

It is not to be disputed that, with all their precaution, these men have dared and suffered a good deal for the cause of truth. Moderate as has been the radicalism that they have shown, it has procured them no little obloquy. A writer on this subject said a few days ago: "It is safe to say that no set of men have been more bitterly reviled than the eminent scholars who helped to lay the foundations for the present structure of biblical study, notwithstanding the fact that many of these scholars, in addition to their devotion to science, were also preëminent as earnest leaders of religious thought."

The most weighty work of these men is one called "The Sacred Books of the Old Testament." It is edited by the distinguished Professor Haupt. It gives the Hebrew text and the English translation, with notes by eminent scholars of the advanced school. In this work the break with traditional views regarding the origin and composition of many of the books of the Old Testament has been more or less violent. The Pentateuch, instead of being regarded as the work of a single mind and dating from the beginning of the national existence of the Hebrews, is declared to be the result of a long process involving the combination of quite a number of documents, historical, prophetic, and legal, of unequal date, but not brought together in their present shape till the return from the Babylonian exile. The historical books proper similarly embody the labors of many compilers, the later one using the material provided by his predecessors and either adding to it or contenting himself with a different arrangement. The Psalms represent the hymn-book of the second temple, and while some of the pieces in the collection are old, the majority date from the Babylonian exile and the centuries following. Lamentations does not represent a unit composition, but a series of independent chapters of unequal date and composed by different hands, united simply because of agreement in the subject they treat of. Half of the book of Isaiah dates from a period varying from one hundred to three hundred years subsequent to the time that the prophet of that name lived, and scarcely a book in the great prophetic series but contains chapters that cannot have originated with the author to whom they are ascribed. The books of Chronicles are the work of a priest whose view of the past is colored by an ideal of theocratic government, the reality and antiquity of which he attempts to establish. Ecclesiastes is a skeptical bit of philosophy, written under the influence of Greek thought, but brought into conformity by later editions with the trend of orthodox doctrine; and so on throughout the list.

Startling as some of these propositions may appear to the orthodox at first blush, it is to be borne in mind that many of the traditional views to which they stand opposed find little or no support in the Old Testament itself. Thus the supposition, so generally accepted until a short time ago, that David is the author of the Psalms is directly contradicted by the Hebrew headings of quite a number of them, according to which they are either anonymous or assigned to other persons than David. It is nowhere stated in Ecclesiastes that Solomon is the author, nor are the Lamentations declared to be the work of Jeremiah. Even so fundamental a proposition as that Moses is the author of the Pentateuch finds no warrant by a reference to the books comprising the same. The laws contained therein are issued in the name of Moses, but it is not said that he wrote the book of Genesis, which does not contain any laws, nor are we told that Moses combined the laws with the historical narrative within which they are incased. On the contrary, the fact that Moses is always spoken of in the third person is sufficient indication that he is not supposed to be the author.

An illustration of the method is furnished in the first part of the undertaking to leave the press, the book of Job. According to the distinguished professor Siegfried, who is the editor of this part, Job is not a work produced at a single stroke, but in its present shape gives evidence of having been submitted to considerable revision, in the course of which additions to the original "stock" have been made, and no small number of interpretative and corrective clauses added. Moreover, he is of the opinion that the book contains a number of "parallel compositions," by which he means sections that duplicate one another and represent different treatments of the same theme. Thus, in chapter x, verses 18 to 22 inclusive form a parallel to chapter iii. Such passages—about ten in all—Professor Siegfried prints in blue color. Again, detecting traces of some commentator—and in the ancient Orient the owner of a manuscript is generally identical with the commentator—who adds some thoughts of his own to such speeches of Job as seem to him to contradict the orthodox doctrine of retribution, Professor Siegfried prints these interpolations, some seven in all, in red. Another class of interpolations which are directed against the tendency of the poem are printed in green.

Thus the more advanced theologians are now pronouncing the Bible to be, what it is described as in the words of one of the writers for THE TRUTH SEEKER, "a collection of Hebrew literature, fragmentary and of mixed and uncertain authorship, extending over a period of a thousand years." And some time they will give in to telling the whole truth, that it contains in no shape the least iota of what is divine.

Religion a Bottler and Forwarder of Cholera.

The number of persons whom religion has killed in wars, massacres, and tortures is vast. Yet the persons killed thus are only one to every hundred that have been killed by religion through the action of disease. When Christianity prevailed controllingly, people lived only two-thirds as long as they do now. The diseases which cut their lives short received aid, first, from the unwholesome religious customs of fasting, monkish cell-life, abstinence from bathing, and the like; and second, from the employment of holy relics and prayers as curative agents instead of the measures of physicians.

An instance of this friendliness of religion to disease is being brought to light at Mecca. Mecca is the sacred city of the Mohammedans. Within the past two months the mystery of the cholera has been cleared up, and it has been definitely ascertained that Mecca is the center from which that pestilence radiates, and that the Holy Well of Zemzem is the nucleus, as it were. In this well all the pilgrims wash themselves, believing in the efficacy of its sacred waters. These waters they also drink. The consul at Yiddah writes: "This well is not a spring. Its water is supplied by filtration, by rain water passing through the overlaying mass of foul matter. Another cause of the pollution of the well is the thousands of pilgrims, diseased and unsound, who daily wash beside it, the water they use naturally finding its way back into the well. Mecca has a permanent population of forty thousand, to which are added during the pilgrimage one hundred and fifty thousand pilgrims, residents for periods varying from a week to three months." Water from this holy well was analyzed recently. It contained more animal matter than the average London sewer water. It showed traces of previous pollution equal to six times that of the average London sewage. None but Mohammedans are allowed to enter Mecca, so no proper description of the horror of this summer there has been printed. One Mohammedan authority says that a camping-place of pilgrims returning from Mecca is like a battle-field where the dead are not yet buried. This year and last year the resulting epidemic was cholera, but in other years it has been other diseases. Some years it is smallpox, again yellow fever. A pilgrimage always breeds something, and at the breaking up scatters it to the four corners of the earth. Year after year the holy well of Zemzem is the instrument of infection. The bathing in and drinking of the water at Mecca itself is not the worst. Those who are not able to go to Zemzem ask the pilgrims to bring them some of its waters. And in tens of thousands of flasks and bottles these deadly waters are carried away to be drunk in cities and villages all over the Mohammedan world. The pilgrim himself may escape, but he bears bottled cholera with him, and in some unhealthy village hundreds of miles from Zemzem its poisonous waters are set free to start a new center of infection. In former times the danger was not so great as in recent years. With increased facilities for transportation, with the shortening of the time in transit, the disease has a chance to spread more widely and to get further from its place of origin before being discovered. It may travel undetected far down into India, or as far as France, or Spain, or England, or even nearly to America. And if among the immigrants to America there is one with a bottle of Zemzem, he may not release his poison until after he has landed.

The most enlightened Mohammedans are beginning to realize that something must be done. But even they hesitate, because of the fanaticism of the masses. The masses, far from complaining of these pestilences, look upon them as acts of God for the trial of Mohammedan virtue. According to Mohammedan ideas, he who dies on a pilgrimage, like him who dies in battle for the true faith, is caught up to a heaven of especial glory. And as for the slaughter of these pestilences in the Christian world, this delights the Mohammedans, who are thus confirmed in their belief that the pestilences are of God's sending. The sultan and the other Mohammedan leaders may regret the scattering of poison throughout the world from the center of Mohammedan faith, but their influence, though great, does not extend to the changing of religious belief. Indeed, by meddling with the faith they would simply legislate themselves out of office. And to suggest sanitation or any other renovation in connection with the Mohammedan holy of holies means radical change, to which the Mohammedan world is no nearer educated than it was a thousand years ago. All sorts of plans have been suggested by which something could be done without touching Mohammedan fanaticism, but none of the plans is of account, because none gets at the root of the matter. Sanitary inspection everywhere else but at Mecca is part of the battle, but only a small part. For as long as the "cholera nursery" remains untouched, the cholera germs will escape the most intelligent and assiduous vigilance.

This condition of things is precisely like that which prevailed in Europe when the priest ruled, with his finger on the physician's mouth. Pestilence after pestilence swept over that region, sometimes carrying off a quarter of the inhabitants of a country. Piety, as in the case of the present Mohammedans, resented any attempt to stay the diseases by natural means. Europe and America would be the same now had not the Freethinker risen, in spite of the church's efforts, and declared that disease springs from natural instead of supernatural causes, and must be avoided by natural instead of supernatural measures. The clergy are perpetually fighting to have as many events attributed to supernatural causes as they can, and if they could they would have people account for disease thus now, and would bring society again into the miserable suffering and dying state of the Dark Ages.

The New York World has just gathered the opinions of about a baker's dozen of persons, more or less known to the public, as to who are the twenty-five leading Americans. Of the lists written out by these judges, one-half contain Colonel Ingersoll's name. This beloved appellation appears on the lists of Postmaster Dayton of New York city, Superintendent Byrnes of the police of the same town (here in the shape of "Bob Ingersoll"), Theatrical Manager French, Assistant District Attorney John McIntyre, Mrs. Frank Leslie, and Oliver Sumner Teall. We must not overlook, either, the fact that the same honor is paid the colonel by John L. Sullivan; who with a wide-minded toleration which we are pleased to see characterizes that gentleman, includes also, written just above Mr. Ingersoll's, the names of Archbishop Corrigan and T. De Witt Talmage. Among those who omit the name of him whom our readers know to be not only the chief in intellect of the leading Americans, but the noblest and dearest of them, are Ward McAllister and Belva Lockwood.

If the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER doesn't go broke before October 1st he is going to Chicago to the International Congress of Freethinkers, where he hopes to meet a goodly number of his friends, thank them for their many favors, and have a chat with them.

The Congress bids fair to be as genial a gathering as one of the old-time New York state meetings, which were the bright particular spots in years of labor and sometimes depression. We ought to have much brilliant oratory, for all the lecturers are to be there, and all the editors will be there too to set down and print their wisdom. The program is an entertaining one, and the discussion of practical affairs, as started by Mr. Putnam's correspondents in this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER, will lend variety and piquancy to the occasion.

Liberals going to the Fair should make the Congressional season their season. Harvest will be over, and we hope, too, that by that time the financial jugglers who started the senseless panic will allow the country to resume its normal prosperity. Cool weather will prevail, October is the most delightful of months in Chicago, and everything ought to conduce to a good time at this union of freemen.

In the published speeches of Edgar Fawcett, the well-known novelist, appears the following. He is speaking of the coming poet: "I have little doubt that this age of ours will be satisfactorily expressed by but one sort of poetic intelligence—the sort that is now expressible in concrete terms by such a personality as that of Robert G. Ingersoll. I think that Mr. Ingersoll, through his splendidly eloquent utterances, his abhorrence of shams, his merciless logic, his warm love for humanity, his reverence for the great achievements of science, and his incomparable courage in pointing out the absurdities with which so-called revelation abounds, will prove an absolute beacon-light to the American poet of the future. Deprived of its gods and goddesses, its supernatural love, its pietisms, its genuflections before a deity whose anthropomorphic existence is to be imagined solely through the intensity of his cruelties toward mankind, poetic literature will find in the prose poetry of such men as Herbert Spencer, Lecky, Huxley, and our own wonderful Ingersoll the stimulus and watchword of its unborn renown. Two fairies will stand at the cradle of the great coming American poet. Their names will be Science and Agnosticism. They will be, if you please, his two calm, gracious, yet severe muses, their locks filleted by no Greek or Roman laurel, yet radiant with the light of love and charity. They will bear him priceless gifts—an intellect from which all twilight of superstition has been swept, a heart alive to every impulse of kindness, a spirit pregnant with all fine and sweet moral truths as the heaven of space above him will be pregnant with its burning stars."

"Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

What a glorious thing it is to him who may enjoy favors and privileges that are denied to his fellow-creatures. I assert this in a general way, and not in the abstract. In times like the present, qualifications are absolutely necessary when expressing one's thoughts or opinions. Yet here in the busy, bustling city of Chicago, undisturbed save by the warning clang of the gong on the fire-engines, the roll of drums, and the clarion shrieks of the bugles as some troop marches past to participate in the train of events transpiring day by day at the World's Fair, I have been favored with an opportunity that has as yet been denied to other curious eyes. That opportunity was nothing more nor less than a glance over the voluminous pages of manuscript now in course of preparation for the above work. While its prolific author lay in the dreamy embrace of Somnus, entirely oblivious to his surroundings, I stole from my couch in the early morning hours and, perceiving the pile of MSS. as it lay upon the desk, I seized the opportunity this occasion offered to take a glance at the contents. Here in vivid colors I saw, as it were, in words of beauty, a description of the progress we have made for the last four centuries. The slow but sure and steady advancement of philosophy, despite the opposition of orthodox creeds; a description of the impassioned labors of science, undermining forever the tottering walls of the "Ark of God;" the steady strides of learning and education, the greater factors in the moral and intellectual development of the race—all these are described in glowing language, clear and easy of understanding. I can truly say, beyond doubt, that this work will become one of the most interesting of this kind ever published in the name of Freethought. The book is at once historical, biographical, scientific, philosophic, and educational. The writing will entail some months of patient labor upon its author, which is deserving and highly commendable to the Liberal public. And then the picture-gallery, in which the pictures of one hundred Freethinkers, living and dead, will be faithfully portrayed. Each picture will occupy one whole page in itself. They will be on the order of photo-lithographs. The cost of the pictures will amount to $5 in itself. The book will contain six hundred pages of solid reading-matter; besides it will be a glorious addition to our Freethought libraries, and no true Freethinker can afford to be without it. Besides, those who now subscribe for the book will help along our great International Congress. Then,

On Freethinkers, on ye brave,
On to glory or the grave, but do not, I beg of you, "on to the grave" until you have subscribed for "Four Hundred Years of Freethought."

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

We desire to call the attention of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benefits of subscribing to the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. The yearly subscription is only $3, and subscribers to the Library receive a paper-bound copy of each book issued in it; or, if they desire the books in cloth binding, subscribers can remit the difference in price between paper and cloth binding, and get the books in the latter shape. So far this year subscribers to the Library have received "Paine Vindicated," by Colonel Ingersoll, price 15 cents; the "Creation of God," by Dr. Hartmann, price 50 cents; the "Resurrection of Jesus," by Don Allen, price 40 cents; "Crimes of Preachers," price 25 cents; the "Handbook of Freethought," by W. S. Bell, price 50 cents; "Religion a Curse," by S. P. Putnam, price 25 cents; "Design Argument Fallacies," price 15 cents; "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," price 25 cents, and "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian," price 50 cents. Other books besides are in preparation. One of these, we may mention, is "Pleasure and Progress," by A. M. Lorentz, LL.B., of which further notice will shortly be made. Send $3 and receive at once the books already published, and, as they appear, those which will be published between now and January, '94.

The Rich Man Defended.

There has been much said and much written and published in favor of the poor workingman and against the rich man or his money, which is claimed to do the workingman a great injustice. We have often thought of this subject, but have failed to comprehend the great evil that others do see in the wealth that man possesses. When we look around us over the state of our own nation that we call governed by free institutions that claim all men to have equal right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, we see one man's right is as good to get and hold property as another's, but it seems that all have not the gift to do so. Then how can we blame the rich man for using his money as he may think best? If he should hide it away like the miser and keep it out of circulation, then he might be blamed for that; but this is not often done; he wants to add to his pile, so we see him building factories and making railroads and all the great improvements of our country, and in so doing give employment to thousands of poor people, and that gives the poor man a chance to feed and clothe himself and family too. Now I will tell you how I began in life for myself. I am now in my eighty-ninth year. In 1826 I went into my father's sawmill to work, with my wife to keep house, and I staid there two years. I did not like the business. I was brought up on a farm and that was my element, so I concluded to buy a little farm; so I bought a piece of land and agreed to give $1,400 for it. I could pay but $400 down, and gave a mortgage for $1,000. I went to work on it in the spring of 1828. Everything was low. I drew corn twelve miles and sold it for forty-two cents, and wheat for forty cents. I paid $70 interest, and I took my team winters, went into the lumber woods and worked for $1 per day. I could hire a good man to work on my farm for $10 per month, or a girl to spin wool or flax for five shillings per week or do housework for seventy-five cents. But now everything is changed. A man must have $20 per month and the girl $2 or $3 per week. But I still own and occupy the little farm—sixty-eight years, at East Lake George, in Warren county. And now there is a great cry against the rich man for holding mortgages that cover almost all of the Western farms, and that may be so. But how can he be to blame for that? Undoubtedly that gave the settler time to turn himself and work out. And again, the rich man owns the railroads. If he does, that helps the producer to send his stuff to the market of the world, and here is another great help to the poor man that he ought to be proud of—at least, be thankful for. If the laboring man cannot get work in one place to suit him he is free to go and work in another. The government has been blamed for not doing more for the poor man, when, in fact, it has given him a good home if he would accept it and go onto the homestead farm and go to work on it and raise his living; and here the government has done much for the poor man. The poor of the foreign nations have taken advantage of this offer and flocked to this country in great numbers, and now are enjoying the fruits of our forefathers, that spilled their life's blood to leave an inheritance to their own dear offspring that were dearer than their own life's blood; and as Patrick Henry said in Congress, Give me liberty or give me death. And now the poor man of the old country is enjoying liberties of our free institutions that the rich man's money has built up and maintains. They send their children to our free schools that the rich man supports, and he pays for their education. Still some keep on finding fault. Never were there any better times for the poor man than 1893. He can buy a good suit of clothes for less than $10, and all wool at that. Our Western people are much dissatisfied, or some of them, at least, and are forming parties in hope to control and manage the general government. Perhaps it is only a few of the influential ones that want to run the ship, like the little priest with his long fingers in Uncle Sam's pockets, in which he has been very fortunate in getting his church property exempt from taxation, and throwing the burden on many a poor man, with a family to support too. And here the poor man might justly complain, but he generally bears the burden as patiently as the ox or the horse under the whip or spur. And here again we see the influence of the little priest in politics, and both parties are in to get his help, which it is abominable to think is so. When we look ahead into the future that awaits us, and imagine the consequences of a civil war, we have only got to look back less than a year to see what the influence of religion has done in our Congress in violating the Constitution of our country by shutting the gates of the World's Fair on Sunday. We would think Congress would be ashamed to invite the friendly foreign nations to come and visit us and when they come to slam the doors in their faces and say: Go home or go to church; we don't want such wicked ones here as you are. But we think, he that is without sin let him cast the first stone. We would not think that a man qualified to hold the office of president and run the United States of America would ever stoop so low as to lend his influence to buy his way into office and then violate the sacred oath which he has taken to support the sacred Article that cost so much blood to gain. The church and politics are exchange partners—you help me and I will help you into office; after I am in power then I will give you a fat place in return. But this we have to regret—our nation is drifting away from the principles that made us a free people.

'Tis sad, I say, and well I may,
To see our nation die
By their own hand, in this fair land;
Now, who will breathe a sigh?

Our fathers dead no tears will shed
About our future state,
Or even know the bitter woe,
Or dream of our sad fate.

Always in the Way.

Christians differ among themselves about a pope and a purgatory, about drinking, dancing, keeping of Sunday, etc.; though they all, with an insignificant exception, unite on a belief in the Mosaic God and his peculiar son Jesus, as recorded in old fables, and hold this belief necessary to escape the God's everlasting wrath. Owing to these differences, the world is progressing, and liberty of thought and speech prevails in some sections of Christendom. But the bloody cross of this God and son is the banner around which all Christians still flock and threaten to subdue all opposition.

Now, Liberals may safely differ on questions of government, of finance, of capital and labor, of sexology, etc.; but while discussing these important subjects we should remember that the priest is always in the way of progress, and must be got rid of. We need to have a potent bond or banner ever in view that will unite and inspire us. Priestcraft is the great obstacle to human liberty. Therefore every Liberal's banner should be, The Blessings of Science vs. the Evils of Priestcraft. And probably the Freethought Federation of America opens one of the best methods of effective concerted action.

Progress is made only when and where the priest is thrust aside. Seldom is a discovery made, or a progressive step taken, and the priest be not there with his theological barricade. Do we try to treat the Sunday question from a rational, historical standpoint, we encounter the priest with an antediluvian order that no servile work shall be done on the Sabbath, and no fun nor recreation allowed except the pleasure of listening to the reciting and shouting of his crazy visions and the fun of contributing generously to his Lord through him.

Do we want to tax churches equally with other property and be just to all citizens, we find the priest entrenched on the same old worthless authority. The Levite is there demanding tithes and fatlings with which to enrich and feed his God through himself: "What man soever of Israel that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, and bringeth it not unto the tabernacle to offer an offering unto the Lord [priest], blood shall be imputed unto that man; he shall be cut off from among his people" (Lev. xvii, 3). And this gluttonous god-priest mixes a hygienic law with a moral law in this wise: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien" (Deut. xiv, 21). O that Christian men would read the stuff as it is written!

If it be proposed to modify the marriage tie the better to enable the wife to escape from a brutal husband, the priest is met with his Thus saith the Lord, "Let not man put asunder." The knot may hurt, but it is awfully sacred.

When, peradventure, a man and woman imprudently transgress a local rule of custom and we ask impartial treatment of the two, we are confronted by the priest with this clincher from the God who "is no respecter of persons": "Whosoever lieth carnally with a woman that is a bondmaid, betrothed to a husband: She shall be scourged; but he shall bring his trespass offering unto the Lord, and the sin which he hath done shall be forgiven him" (Lev. xix, 20). O that Christian women would read the Bible as it is written.

An attempt anywhere in Christendom, with few exceptions, to change or modify the civil government is met by the priest with his heavenly command to "obey the powers that be." Here, in 1776, the people, led by a few Freethinkers (Paine, Franklin, Jefferson, etc.), ignored that old dogma. Kingcraft was scotched, if not killed; but some kingly prerogatives are still exercised by "the powers that be." And this fact leads some few Liberals to advocate a state of Anarchy—no government. Of course every Liberal wants a liberal government, with no priest or Comstock attachment. But evolution works slowly; and not before the time is reached when no wrong shall be done and when everyone yields to everyone else all the rights he claims for himself, can we do without government. Law is found in every department of nature, with accompanying force to execute the law. Human society cannot exist without law and a government or force to execute the law. Just in proportion as we are fit for self-government we are responsible for the wisdom or unwisdom of the laws.

Experience, reason, humanity, enables us to modify the natural law of "the survival of the fittest," and through human law and united force to protect the weak. In establishing this force, some discretion necessarily is given to legislators and executives. This discretion may be used wisely or unwisely. In this country, when the use of such discretion is unwise, extravagant, bad, it is the province of the voters to select better officials. If through ignorance they cannot do so, the cause may be traced to the priest, who declares that his God is the author of all government and sole ruler over the affairs of men. Here the priest is in the way. Knock him out. And priest rule and pope have been always in the way of Irish home rule.

Probably a greater number of Liberals, in their opposition to private monopolies, want to extend the powers of government; to have it control and operate all railroads, telegraphs, mines, etc. No head-center has yet or can be devised short of an absolute monarch to conduct such a government. Authority would have to be concentrated in a sort of Mosaic God—the champion monopolist. The individual sovereign is of no great account now; he would then be a nonentity.

While some are advocating the doubtful policy of unlimited silver coinage, many of our Liberal friends want the government to give up the use of coin and issue enough paper money to satisfy everybody, and to loan the paper to anybody at one or two per cent. Now, as only those having houses or other property could give security and obtain a loan, and as such a policy would inflate values, it follows that the poor man would be worse off than ever. Here is a hitch, as there always is in any meddlesome attempt of government: helping the few hurts the many. Or, should government rush the presses and give free to every inhabitant all the paper money each could carry, surely financial chaos would follow.

But, says the paper advocate, gold has no intrinsic value; that it rests solely on the superstitious opinion; that paper, being cheaper than gold, as a matter of economy should only be used for money; that the interest cost of a gold dollar in a dozen years or so equals its original value, etc. Now, the admitted fact that gold is the more costly presents another hitch in his theory. It matters not whether we call the value intrinsic, artistic, or ornamental. Like the fellow in the stocks on a Sunday, it is there. Gold is preferable in many uses because it retains its purity. Everybody prefers a gold spoon to a brass or pewter one, with verdigris or lead poison.

Had the Southern Confederacy issued gold and silver coin, that coin would have had a market value to-day; because throughout the civilized world those metals are received in commercial exchange. No paper money can obtain so wide indorsement. Were the nation issuing it exempt from war's disruption, the paper is more easily counterfeited and more liable to destruction. The attempt through faith to make paper of equal value with gold, is somewhat like the notion that a God made the world out of nothing.

But these interesting questions of government and currency are of minor importance compared with the great evil of priestcraft. Plainly the increase of numbers and influence in the ranks of Liberals is causing different Christian sects to stop the long-practiced recreation of denouncing and persecuting each other. For self-preservation they are now acting together in the attempt to fit on to every mortal a Sunday strait-jacket; to inoculate the plastic mind of every school-child with the fables about a virgin Mary, about a God-Jesus that wandered around the barren hills and stagnant ponds of Syria for two or three years, and then left for parts unknown without ever finding or knowing anything of America, etc. This partial Christian conspiracy strengthens them somewhat; and Liberals must recognize and prepare for a stubborn, prolonged contest with a cruel theological superstitution. Truly it may be said, the priest is always in the way.

L. G. REED.

Design a Creation of Faith.

In all creation there is design. The crane, with its long legs and bill, can stand in shallow water and catch the little fish as they pass by. True it is hard on the fish, and the crane is a useless production; but here faith comes to the rescue, and says: Nothing in vain; an all-wise God knows best. The herbivorous animals are destroyed by the billion to support a carnivore, and man destroys all things and his fellow-men besides, and all proves, if we have faith, the glorious plan and design of creation. The daisy, the beautiful daisy, has no prickles to wound the spoiler; while the noxious thistle, cactus, and thorn have prickles by the million to protect their worthless existence. The fawn, whose eye is a poem, is torn to shreds by the fangs of the wolf or the lion, and the harmless, innocent dove, quivering with agony and terror, dies to prolong the life of a hawk, and thousands of honest women and men live and die in poverty and misery to support a few of their own race in luxury and debauchery. Life is dogged by death; creation by destruction; honesty is the prey of roguery; virtue of vice; and all goes to prove the wisdom, mercy, and intelligence of the creator. If we have a Samson-sinewed faith, with such faith, out of these jarring and discordant elements, a Christian or a savage manufactures one merciful god or a billion at the dictation of his priests.

Why Do Religious People Lie So?

The religionists before the vote was taken in Congress piled up mountains of lies and committed forgery in offering lists of petitions of the names of many thousands more persons in several of the states than the last census showed were inhabitants including men, women, and children in those states. Then they talk of the holy Sabbath!

On such basis as this they claimed that a large majority of the people, and especially the working men and women, were in favor of closing the Fair on Sunday.

By such falsehoods and forgeries, coupled with threats of boycotting every member of Congress who dared to vote against them—corrupt themselves, and thus corrupting all others with whom they come in contact, trampling the Constitution under their feet as Jeff Davis, Toombs, and Yancy did in 1861—they induced the unprincipled politicians to vote for closing the "greatest show on earth" one-seventh of the time, and on what should be the people's day.

These enemies of progress, morality, and freedom, self-styled "law and order people," when fairly beaten in the Supreme Court of the United States, in an opinion delivered by the chief justice himself, abused the justices who favored the opening of the Fair on Sundays, invoked their gods to send lightnings and fires from heaven or cyclones from hades to destroy the greatest educational exhibition on the only habitable globe that we know anything about.

But finding that the gods paid no attention to their foolish mutterings they then called upon their cranky dupes and frighten them from going to this greatest exhibition of the genius and industry of man, and by inducing the puritanical exhibitors to close the greater number of the buildings and exhibits, and acting in collusion with the railway companies prevented them from getting up excursions to take the people to the Fair, and by threats and chicanery prevented the directory from reducing the fee for admission to twenty-five cents, and by these fraudulent means prevented the great mass of the people from attending the Fair, and then declaring that the closing of the Fair was done by the gods in answer to the prayers of these lying, piratical priests.

On Saturday last a small newspaper, rather some printing on a sheet of paper containing more lies to the square inch than all the newspapers published in the interest of the Wall street wreckers and robbers since Chicago convention in June E. M. 292, was thrown into my yard, and among other falsehoods the leading article stated that notwithstanding the decisions of the state and United States courts, the directory had become convinced that the people were opposed to the opening of the Fair on Sundays, because so few attended on the first day of the week, and that the working men and women would not attend because they were determined to have "Sunday for a day of rest."

This was adding insult to injury.

Why is it that religion will make men and women lie faster and more unblushingly than all other things combined?

Every person of any intellect and fairness, and that has sufficient information to enable him to find his way across the street, knows that the people, and especially the artists, mechanics, and working class, did not attend the Fair on Sunday because these lying enemies of the right, of justice, of liberty, of progress, and of education had used every false and unfair means that their saintly and malignant ingenuity could invent to shut the gates against the people and keep them away.

If it is true, as the pietists declare, that the devil exists and loves liars, then he will get all of them, because there is no profession or class of men on this earth that can utter lies that would shame the prince of liars himself so fast and recklessly as these pretended men of God.

Why Christianity Is Declining.

In a late sermon delivered in one of the Baptist churches of Binghamton, N. Y., by Rev. Benjamin L. Herr, he dilated upon and suggested methods for increasing the growth and strength of the Christian church, and admitted and bewailed its decline. Among the many methods suggested there were none that might be considered practical, for he omitted each and all of those which had been employed with success in the past. He probably lacked the courage to stand up before the congregation and advocate the total extinction of secular schools, and perpetuation of a government under absolute church control. Protestant and all other Christian churches make a great mistake when, in their desire to keep abreast with the times in liberality of ideas, they encourage education in any but ecclesiastical and dogmatic channels. Free education of the masses, especially in science and history, has been, is now, and always will be destructive to the elements which are of vital importance to the Christian or any other religion. The most tractable and intensely religious people are those most densely ignorant.

Figures to Aid Thought.

Acting Director of the Mint Preston has prepared a table of the monetary systems approximate stocks of money in the aggregate and per capita in the principal countries of the world. This table shows that the aggregate stock of gold is $3,582,605,000; silver, $4,042,700,000; uncovered paper, $2,635,873,000.

The stock of gold possessed by the principal countries is given as follows: United States, $604,000,000; Great Britain, $550,000,000; France, $800,000,000; Germany, $600,000,000; Russia, $250,000,000.

The silver stock of these same countries is given as follows: United States, $615,000,000; Great Britain, $100,000,000; France, $700,000,000; Germany, $211,000,000; Russia, $60,000,000. This stock of silver is divided by Mr. Preston as follows: United States, $538,000,000 full tender and $77,000,000 limited tender; Great Britain, no silver full tender, $100,000,000 limited tender; France, $650,000,000 full tender and $50,000,000 limited tender; Germany, $103,000,000 full tender and $108,000,000 limited tender; Russia, $22,000,000 full tender and $38,000,000 limited tender.

The ratio prevailing in nearly all the principal countries between gold and legal-tender silver is 1 to 15½. This is the ratio in France, Belgium, Italy, Spain, Netherlands, Russia, and Central and South America. The ratio between gold and limited-tender silver is as a rule 1 to 14.38. The respective ratios in the United States are 1 to 15.98 and 1 to 14.95.

The various monetary systems as divided among the several countries are as follows:

Gold and silver—United States, France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, Greece, Spain, Netherlands, Turkey, and Japan.

Gold—United Kingdom, Germany, Portugal, Austria, Scandinavian Union, Australia, Egypt, Canada, and Cuba.

Silver—Russia, Mexico, Central and South America, and India.

Of the uncovered money South America has $600,000,000; Russia, $500,000,000; the United States, $412,000,000; Austria, $260,000,000; Italy, $163,000,000; Germany, $107,000,000; France, $81,000,000, and Great Britain, $500,000,000.

The per capita circulation of gold is: United States, $9.01; United Kingdom, $14.47; France, $20.52; Germany, $12.12; Russia, $2.21.

The per capita of all classes of money is: France, $40.56; Cuba, $31.00; Netherlands, $28.88; Australia, $26.75; Belgium, $25.53; United States, $24.34; United Kingdom, $13.42, and Russia, $7.16.

The Bimetallic Problem.

What necessity is there for changing the ratio of the silver coinage?

Let Congress pass an act making all debts payable, half in gold and half in silver, unless otherwise stipulated.

Or, without such an act, let all written promises to pay be so worded—half in gold and half in silver.

Behold, How These Christians Love One Another!

A Christian, named J. W. Ellis, used to be a Presbyterian minister in San Francisco, until the presbytery there convicted him of misusing the funds of his church, and kicked him out of the ministry. Now he says he will appeal to the synod to unkick him, and if it doesn't he says he will start a newspaper to rub out all the San Franciscan Presbyterian ministers. A newspaper man recently interviewed him, and here is the burden of Christian love which this reverend embezzler dumped into the sympathizing bosom of the reporter, with a view to show that God almighty is a thorough-going Ellisite:

Every minister who took part in taking my pulpit away from me has lost his own pulpit. Distress and disaster have come upon them all. God has forsaken them. T. Chalmers Easton was compelled to resign from Calvary church as pastor. He was one of the leading prosecutors against me. The next was Rev. A. J. Kerr, who conducted the prosecution. The missionary board withdrew financial support from him and he had to go East for another field. Rev. Dr. Chapman, of Oakland, lost his church and is now financial manager for Mills seminary. Rev. J. F. Rhoda declared that his field in South San Francisco was a useless one. God had withdrawn his support from it, and the church was compelled to abandon it. With it went Rhoda. Dr. Thompson tried several things for a year and then gave them up. Not only have the ministers suffered, but so has the church. Since my trial, they have lost four churches. One of them was the Woodbridge, which has gone over to the Unitarians. The Central Tabernacle has been wiped out of existence, and a new one is in its place. Two of our flourishing congregations in San Mateo have gone over to the Congregationalists.

It is none of our funeral, to be sure, but would not Brother Ellis do better to stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord wipe out his enemies, without undertaking to set up a newspaper? To the unregenerate mind, starting that newspaper will look very like as if the Lord had deserted Brother Ellis and flopped over to the presbytery of San Francisco. In Job's time a man who hated anybody used to say: "Oh, that mine enemy had written a book!" It is a much more horrid wish nowadays to say, "Oh, that mine enemy had started a newspaper!"

Short Notes About Books.

The Truth Seeker Company, 28 Lafayette place, New York, have just brought out a most suggestive paper volume, "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" by John E. Remsburg.—Boston Daily Traveler.

"Pen Pictures of The World's Fair," by Samuel P. Putnam, published by The Truth Seeker Company of New York, begins with a description of the opening of the Fair, done in the style known to newspaper-men as "fine writing." In the last analysis, the phrase means bad taste in the use of a wealth of words. The TRUTH SEEKER is evidently a flamboyant Atheist. For instance: "They say that President Cleveland joined audibly in the Lord's Prayer at the close. Well, it's just like him. He's getting to be awfully pious. Does that mean a third term and colossal ambition? I do distrust these fellows that pray. Yes, it's pray and pray, that's what it is." Mr. Putnam apparently aims to be blasphemous.—Buffalo Illustrated Express.

One of the most really useful books to the ordinary Freethinker is "A Handbook of Freethought" by W. S. Bell, a well-known American publicist. Mr. Bell modestly enough claims that he has "selected" the book, not written it. He has deliberately elected to be useful rather than to be famous; and he has so signally reached the former goal that he has left himself not far from the latter. To the young man who has a suspicion that Christian orthodoxy has no basis outside the interests of its clergy and the gullibility of its laity, but who has little time for recondite study, we can recommend Mr. Bell's book without hesitation. If he "assess" it, as Dr. Lewins would say, he will have little difficulty in dealing with the stock arguments of the parson's dupe, or even, in many cases, with the more disciplined arguments of the parson himself.—Agnostic Journal, London.

The Minneapolis Journal says: "The Truth Seeker Company, of 28 Lafayette place, New York, publish a volume by John Remsburg, entitled, 'Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?' He takes three hundred pages to reply in the negative and asserts that his conclusion only adds enormously to Lincoln's greatness. He affirms that it will not be long before the acceptance of the doctrines of Christianity will be considered an evidence of human weakness. Mr. Remsburg has not proved that Lincoln was not a Christian, but his effort, quite laborious, is certainly not much to his credit." That is to say, it is no credit to Mr. Remsburg to tell the truth! The kind of morality held by the Minneapolis Journal is now known.

What Shall the Freethought Congress Do?

The following letters refer to important matters and require consideration:

PIERSON, IA., Aug. 7, 1893.
S. P. PUTNAM, Esq., My Dear Sir: Inclosed please find check for $5. Please put my name down for your "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I earnestly hope you will be able to make the Convention a genuine success.

May I propose a question for the Convention (or its friends) to consider? How to adequately cope with the all-pervading activities of church organizations without seriously overburdening the already painfully taxed social fabric?

For instance, in this little town of less than three hundred people there are in the two churches and their ramifications in each year over one hundred regular sermons, besides nearly as many extra—revivals, etc.; one hundred prayer-meetings; over one hundred choir meetings for practice; some fifty meetings for aid societies, etc., besides over one hundred Sunday-schools and about forty to fifty children and young people's meetings. And nearly every form of amusement or enjoyment is the fruit of these numerous church organizations. So completely is the ground covered that the church may be said to be omnipresent, and some sort of subscription or charity matter pertaining to the church is going round about all the time.

Now, the Liberal element here and its sympathizers are about as strong as the church-membership. We had thought (and do contemplate) organizing a Liberal league of some kind. But it seems cruel to add labor and expense and care to this tired, taxed, and busy community. The women are all tired and overworked, for whether church-members or not they are expected to help on each festival, etc., both by cookery and attendance. The young people are all connected with choirs or permanent committees or some other affair of some branch of this huge octopus. The men and married women who are still left to the Liberal cause are heads of families, active business men and women, few of whom would care to be saddled with the responsibilities of regular meetings or other continuous propaganda. Nor have they the heart or desire to further afflict the social fabric with more charities, begging, or importuning. What then is to be done? This continual hammering of the church cannot fail to win an occasional victim and add new fuel to the fire. In some way we must meet and conquer this hydra of superstition. But how? It seems a pity to adopt the same methods we so deprecate in our foe, even if they are the result of age, long experience, and the deliberate counsel of long-headed councils and synods.

Can your "gathered wisdom" grapple and solve the enigma?
Yours truly, S. F. BENSON.

CRAWFORD, MICH., Aug. 16, 1893.
MR. JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, Dear Sir: I take the liberty to address you on the subject of the Freethought Congress, to be held at Chicago in October, and, having read the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Independent Pulpit, I am unable to find any bills to be offered or laws to be passed by said Congress or any object for which said Congress is called.

Also, seeing a call for financial aid, we do not feel like sending very much money if the Congress is simply called to talk infidelity to infidels, and to test our oratory and our eloquence before an audience, and to have a general good time. If that is all its objects, I for one have no finances to spare. I would now say if there is any object for which it is called or work to be done to maintain our liberties, guaranteed to us by the Constitution of the United States, we may feel like doing something. As the time is drawing near, would it not be well to announce its objects through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Liberal papers?

WILLIAM C. DECKER.

What will the Freethought Congress do? What will be its practical outcome? What is the best method of future work? etc. These are the questions presented to us by the above letters. I am glad that these questions are asked, however hard it may be to answer them. I wish more would ask these questions—the more the better. It would show an interest, and if a sufficient number would ask then the answer would be easier, for it is by the interest manifested that we obtain the ability to answer.

In looking forward, however, to future work don't let us forget the great value of the Congress in itself—that it is a good thing to come together, to get acquainted, to make companionship. It is a good thing to shake hands, to hear our best speakers, to be animated by the presentation of grand ideas. It is a good thing to be stirred up, to have the blood run swifter than ordinary. It is a good thing to be in a crowd, and realize for once that we are in a big majority, that we are in the swim. It is a good thing to attract the attention of the world, to show that Freethought is an intellectual power, and that it can be declared in splendid eloquence, music and speeches, flags and banners, flowers and applause, eclat, corps de esprit—these are all good things in their way, and there never yet was a party that won its way without them. We must have enthusiasm, and human nature is so constructed that we can't have enthusiasm unless we get together and have a big time. The churches have to do this, and they'd die if they didn't. Freethought is not thought simply. It is the heart-beat, the glowing feeling, it is a common sentiment.

The Congress in itself is a good thing, and worthy of the support of every Liberal.

But let us also recognize the demands of hard common sense, as well as of poetic ardor. How are we to combine our forces for future work? I believe in organizing great plans and trying to do something far-reaching and effective. I believe that Freethought is to be a permanent power in human civilization. So long as this present civilization endures, so long will Freethought magnificently increase. Don't let us lose faith in our cause. Freethought was born at the martyr's stake of Bruno. See what it is to-day from the lips of Ingersoll, when thousands listen enchanted. What will it not be a hundred years hence, or a millennial from now? Let us look ahead and let us build deep for the centuries that are to come.

Now, first of all, I believe it is time to organize for a great Freethought university. It seems to me that nobody can question the immense benefits of such an institution. I admit that there is a vast amount of Liberal teaching in our universities, but this teaching comes as a matter of necessity and not of choice. Now, I want a university where Freethought is at the basis, is the law of the institution, its supreme choice and purpose, and not an incidental affair oftentimes grudgingly admitted. I want a Freethought university from top to bottom. I want the atmosphere of Freethought all about it. Such an institution as this would be a fountain of mighty influence, and why shouldn't we labor to establish it? We can do it. The thing of it is to begin. We have several centuries before us. We have as much time as the Catholic church. Why not use it as wisely and patiently as that church does? Begin with small means—with a hut if need be and a few dollars, and wait. That is the method of the church and it succeeds.

Five dollars has been offered for the university. Let us start with that and see what can be done. The first thing to do is to locate the institution. I think a committee should be appointed by this Congress to select a location. I think it should be somewhere in the great West, near to the central point of the United States, where land can be purchased at reasonable rates. One hundred acres, if possible, should be purchased. Having settled on the location, then let us raise money to buy the land. When the land is paid for, then build a house on it—small, if need be—install a professor, and go to work. When we really begin to do things in this direction the money will flow in.

Besides the university there ought to be a "summer residence" for Liberals, where we might have a summer school of philosophy, lectures, etc. Our Boston friends have started a thing of this kind and I hope they will be amply supported. There are many Liberals who want to spend a vacation somewhere in the country amidst quiet and beautiful scenes, and yet at the same time they want social stimulant. Why wouldn't it be a good plan for Liberals to select together an agreeable place for summer residence and combine for Freethought lectures, libraries, reading-rooms, etc.? Let us join with our Boston friends and make a success in this direction. So much for the literary, sociable, and educational progress of Freethought. Now for the political work.

I believe that we should pull together for the more decisive action on three main points—church taxation, secularization of public schools, and abolition of all Sabbath laws. I think we should outline a campaign for the coming year, in which thousands of Liberals could unite for effective labor at the ballot-box and legislatures. Thirdly, I believe that Liberals throughout the country should make a tremendous effort to increase the circulation of the Liberal papers. We ought to put special emphasis upon the matter. It is absolutely necessary to the success of my first two propositions. We can't have a university nor political power without a Liberal press, and that Liberal press must constantly increase in circulation. Now, I want the Congress to create so much interest throughout our ranks that every friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator will set to work and get at least one new subscription for the paper he takes. I am quite sure that there are one thousand subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who, if each one made a special determined effort, he could get a new subscriber. Why can't one thousand subscribers do this? Make a combined effort—have a common understanding, and say we will get during this year one new subscriber. See how this would count up. One might say: "A single subscriber don't count much; I won't try;" but suppose he realized that a thousand other Freethinkers were trying with him, and that it wasn't a matter of adding one subscriber but one thousand subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and then he would see in this cooperative action a vast influence added to the Freethought press. Surely by this sort of united effort a thousand subscribers might be added to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator, and the Congress should be an instrumentality to this end.

This is what I propose for future effort—a Freethought university, increased political action on the three main demands, church taxation, secular schools, and no Sabbath laws, and a cooperative union among the subscribers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and Investigator, by which the subscription list of these papers may be increased to the extent of one thousand names this coming year, and other Liberal papers aided accordingly.

I hope that others will enter upon this discussion and tell what is best to do. I have spoken my mind. Before Congress meets let us have a full expression of opinion. We are going to have a grand Congress. Don't let us waste the opportunity, but through this Congress push on the practical work. Don't criticize simply, but tell us what to do, and how to do it. I have shown what I think will benefit our cause. Let others give their views and see if after all we do not agree, and so can pull together.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

Sunday, October 8th.

Addresses will be delivered throughout the day upon various Freethought topics by G. W. Foote, Charles Watts, L. K. Washburn, Samuel P. Putnam, John R. Charlesworth, T. B. Wakeman, J. D. Shaw, John E. Remsburg, Dr. J. L. York, Judge Waite, Mattie P. Krekel, Voltairine de Cleyre, Susan H. Wixon, Mrs. M. A. Freeman, Dr. Juliet H. Severance, and others.

This program is subject to revision by the committee as the circumstances at the moment may demand, although they will endeavor to adhere as closely as possible to the outline given above.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. of Committee of Arrangements.

17 South Curtis street, Chicago.

The International Congress.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Give me space for these friendly words to each and every reader (subscriber or not) of your paper. They refer to the International Congress. They embrace three points.

The cause is in your hands, friends. What are you going to do for it? You are earnest, the call the worthiest. It is urgent. Decide quickly. You value your convictions, back them. Realize that what you now give has treble value. Whatever you can—none of us are too poor for this once—50 cents, $1, $2, $3, $5, $10—do it right off and 'tis done. Do it willingly.

At the other end, Mr. John R. Charlesworth, secretary committee, No. 345 W. Randolph street, Chicago, Ill., will receive and gladly acknowledge the attention.

Liberals everywhere, the occasion is here. Another mile-post in the vigorous life of Liberal thought has been reached. A success, an inspiration, it should undoubtedly be.

No more opportune time could present itself, mark it, for such a gathering as a means to greater, more far-reaching efforts.

Be present if you possibly can. It will help you. It will cheer others, thoughtful men and women—all workers.

If you cannot be there, show your interest in the work to be done and that you would like done. Write an encouraging word. It will take but five minutes. It is almost a duty you owe yourself. Think well of it. Do it, and do it now. It is far from a small matter, this.

It is well to bear it ever in mind, Liberals, it is the duty of each and all of us, so

To act that each to-morrow
Finds us farther than to-day.

That a Liberal poet said. That is the Liberal's oriflam. That is progress.

The earnest Liberal cannot else be than in the van. He is used to stand the brunt of futile prejudice and coward customs. Never yet has Liberal thought led in vain. It compels humanity's betterment. This is worth working for.

The International Congress has its good work to do. Striving for universal enlightenment and liberty—the best use of this world—it calls for the best thought imbued with the unconquerable spirit of truth.

Friend, do your part. Do all you know how. All are expected to do no less.

"But man can do his duty"—simple, yet truly eloquent—said that grand Liberal, Charles Darwin.

To the point, I bespeak your warm response.

Your fellow Liberal, LOUIS LEVINE.

P. S.—When sending a donation if you will mention this letter, Mr. Charlesworth will note amount. For every $100 subscribed in this way, I will contribute an additional $1. Do not let me off cheaply.

Keep this in view. The Congress will open its session at 10 A.M., Sunday, October 1st, at No. 517 West Madison street, continuing eight days. L.
August 18, 1893.

The Truth Seeker Sustained.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I have been a "constant subscriber" of THE TRUTH SEEKER for nearly twenty-one years, and allow me to say that I like your style of running a Freethought journal. I was an Infidel first and a partisan afterward. You need not "stop my paper." I could not keep house without it. I always put my vote where it will do Freethought the most good and Christianity the most harm. A real, genuine, live Liberal has mighty little use for political claptrap.

The three-cornered fight here in Kansas is simply a scramble for boodle. Brother Dallas does not see and realize this, or he would never have penned you the unkind letter he did. Thirty-eight years ago this month I located at Topeka, and for ten years have been engaged in business here. If I am not fairly well posted in the politics of the state I certainly ought to be. The item of news you copied about our Populist governor, Lewellen, was correct as viewed from my non-partisan standpoint. His adjutant-general, Artz, a fugitive from Colorado justice, is reorganizing the state militia on a strict party basis, with evil designs and fell intent as everybody but a blind Populist partisan believes.

The Republican captain of the "Garfield Rifles" of this city was informed a month ago that if he would promise to quietly become a Populist and work to convert his officers and privates to that faith he could retain his commission, otherwise the company would be left out of the new deal. He declined, and the arms, ammunition, and equipments of the company have just been ordered shipped to Topeka, to be placed in the hands of willing tools of knavish demagogues.

Last winter Lewellen called out the militia and ordered it to charge upon the legal house of representatives and drive it from the capitol, but it refused to obey the bloody mandate, and war was averted. Lewellen was formerly a blatant Iowa Prohibitionist.

The Populist party might accomplish some needed reforms were it not led for the most part by a gang of cranks and old, played-out political prostitutes from the other parties.

There is too much blind partisanship. What the country needs is two or three hundred thousand liberty-loving voters who will concentrate on the best man of all the tickets in the field.

Topeka, Kan., Aug. 23, 1893.

Freethinkers, Attention.

The headquarters of the Freethought Federation until October 1st will be 17 South Curtis street, Chicago. Please send all communications for Samuel P. Putnam, president, or John R. Charlesworth, secretary, to this place. All Liberal visitors are cordially welcome. Call if possible between 9 and 12 in the morning. Liberal papers and publications will be for sale at this office and also at Henchel's Academy, 517 W. Madison street, during September and until after Congress. Liberal meetings every Sunday evening during September, and International Congress from October 1st to October 8th, at Henchel's Academy.

Legal Business Encroached on by "the Business of Your Soul, O Great Infidel."

Ever since Colonel Ingersoll began making converts to his ideas on the hereafter he has been besieged by numerous religious cranks and fanatics who write him letters and call at his residence and law office to persuade him to reform before it is too late. Colonel Ingersoll has treated all his callers pleasantly enough and always tried to evade arguing on the subject of religion, but his patience gave out one day early last week, when a couple of religious cranks stopped all business in his Nassau street law office for two hours. While Colonel Ingersoll was discussing with a wealthy client a few days ago as to the best measures to be taken in a heavy railroad suit his private secretary ushered into his office a couple, apparently man and wife, quite respectably attired. It is Colonel Ingersoll's custom to permit all his callers to enter his private office and there await him instead of being obliged to sit in the outer room of his law offices. He does this out of pure good nature, but he will do it no more.

According to a story told to a Herald reporter by a clerk in Colonel Ingersoll's office the couple permitted to enter his private office Tuesday morning last week suddenly startled the colonel and his railroad client by kneeling down in the midst of his books and papers and crying out to the Lord "to save this great Infidel."

"Lord! Lord! Oh, save and have mercy on this enemy of thine, who has done such great injury in thy vineyard," the praying band kept shouting.

"Hold on there! Hold on! I am talking business to a client," exclaimed the colonel.

"Leave off before it is too late and look after the business of your soul. O great Infidel, we have come to save you," cried the exhorters.

"That's all right, but for heaven's sake wait outside, will you, for me! I am thinking about railroads now," said the colonel, as he began to lose patience.

His client suggested that he call in the police. His private secretary stood by helpless while the praying couple continued their exhortations. Suddenly they burst out in song:

Division from the devil,
Division from the wrong,
United in King Jesus
We'll send the cry along;
For in his strength we'll battle
And do our best to win
From Satan all his minions—
To Christ we'll bring them in.

"That will do!" "That will do!" shouted the colonel. "I am a busy man."

But the praying couple only changed their tune and began again:

At the judgment day, great sinner,
When your sentence is passed while you wait,
Oh, how you will plead for your pardon,
But pleading will then be too late.
So make a bold start, great sinner,
Jesus will help you along;
Sweetly and kindly he will guide you,
And he will put in your heart a new song.

This last effort of the praying band was too much for the colonel, who said a few things under his breath and left his private office in possession of the exhorters.

Half an hour later the colonel returned and half opened his door and peeped in.

"Have they gone?" he asked his clerks.

When assured that the praying band had left he ventured to his private office. He called in his stenographer and dictated the following, which was printed in big black letters on a piece of cardboard and hung in a conspicuous place in the main office:

NOTICE.

I DON'T NEED SALVATION.

All persons who wish to pray for me have my permission to do so.

BUT

kindly keep out of my private office until after business hours.

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

Ever since Colonel Ingersoll moved from Wall street up to his Nassau street office, a year ago, he has had scores of religious cranks as callers, but his last visitors were the most persistent. His private secretary described to a reporter some of the recent cranks he has had as visitors.

For instance, Chauncey M. Depew recently received a call from a man who had a new religion already made which he wanted Dr. Depew to put on the market. Dr. Depew could not see his way clear to adopting the new religion, so he sent the maker of it down to Colonel Ingersoll, declaring that he understood the colonel was looking for just such an article. Colonel Ingersoll, after reading Dr. Depew's letter of introduction, handed the fellow a $10 bill. "You can keep this $10," said the colonel, "but for heaven's sake keep out of here." It is needless to say that the man with the new religion accepted the $10.

There is an old lady up in Delaware county who for three years past has been sending Colonel Ingersoll choice bits of hymns, Bible leaflets, sermons, and religious quotations. Last week the colonel received from her a lot of religious matter that had been cut from some weekly paper. In glancing his eyes over it the colonel found that the old lady had made a very bad mistake in pasting into her letter the clippings referred to. Sandwiched in between two hymns which had been cut from a weekly paper was the following:

"Lilly Stebbins's great burlesque show, at Music Hall next Monday evening. Don't miss it! Great galaxy of beauty and talent! All stars!"

The colonel sent this letter back to the old lady in Delaware county, with a polite note of inquiry as to how she made burlesque shows and scripture agree. A few days later the old lady appeared in person to make explanations. In pasting up her scriptural quotations she accidentally turned one upside down, and unfortunately the reverse side of the scriptural quotation contained the theatrical advertisement of the weekly paper of Delaware county.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG will lecture in Michigan during the month of September. His appointments as far as arranged are as follows:

Dorr,	Aug.	31	Gagetown,	Sept.	16, 17
Muskegon,	Sept.	1	Port Huron,	"	18
Ravenna,	"	2, 3	Rochester,	"	19
Hubbardston,	"	4	Northville,	"	20
Howard City,	"	5	Tipton,	"	21
Elk Rapids,	"	6, 7, 8	Mongo (Ind.),	"	22
Traverse City,	"	9, 10	La Grange ("),	"	23
Harriette,	"	11, 12, 13	Lawton,	"	24, 25
Mt. Pleasant,	"	14, 15	Benton Harbor,	"	26

PRELIMINARY to the International Congress, a series of meetings will be held at 517 W. Madison street (Henchel's Academy) during the month of September on Sunday evenings, under the auspices of the Chicago Secular Union, the Freethought Federation, and the American Secular Union. On the first Sunday evening, September 3d, John R. Charlesworth will lecture; on September 10th, Samuel P. Putnam; on September 17th, Mrs. M. A. Freeman and Dr. Juliet Severance, and on September 24th President Beatty, of the Secular Union, and Judge Waite. The object of these meetings is to create an interest in the coming Congress. It is hoped that all visiting Liberals who cannot attend the Congress will make a special effort to attend these meetings. THE TRUTH SEEKER and the Investigator will be for sale at these meetings, and Liberal books and pamphlets. It will be a splendid opportunity to cultivate acquaintance.

Letters of Friends.

Mark It and Mail It.

TORONTO, Aug. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Of several ways given to help THE TRUTH SEEKER, I see no one so good as that I steadily pursue, viz.: Having read it and marked striking passages send it by mail to some one whom you know to have brains enough to "see the point." The marked passages excite curiosity, and it gets treble attention. S. V. G.

Occasionally a Sinner.

KERNSTOWN, VA., Aug. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $3 for paper. My father died on last Feb. 3d, and it is a consolation to me to think he was no Christian. He passed off as quietly as a child going to sleep. He was in his sixty-sixth year. We are located in a religious county, but occasionally we run across a sinner. J. H. SAVAGE.

The Best Gospel—the Gospel of Truth.

MOWRY, ORE., June 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5, for which renew my subscription for one year.

I can't do without the good gospel of truth. Please send me "Old Testament Stories," the "Resurrection of Jesus" (cloth), and "Sabbath-Breaking," by J. E. Remsburg.

I will do all I can to get some new subscribers this year. Lots of Liberals here, but all cowards. A. L. ALLEN.

It Was Got Up by Man to Deceive Man.

CARLISLE, IA., Aug. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $3 to renew my subscription to the paper that I think the best printed in this United States.

I have tried to get you a new subscriber, but as this small town is cursed with seven sky-pilots there is rather a poor look-out as yet. Keep up the pictures. Heston is well posted in that old God-book that in my opinion was got up by man to deceive mankind, and they have succeeded for the last two thousand years in deluding the people. M. GUSINGER.

Why Be Afraid of the Preacher?

MT. CLEMENS, MICH., Aug. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I like THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best Liberal paper I know of, and I shall help it along all that I can. There are several men here that call themselves Liberals; but will they take a Liberal paper? No; they are afraid some of their Christian friends would find it out, and it might hurt their business. Why is it that some are afraid of a preacher? As for myself, I have no use for that class of vermin. They are the bloodsuckers of every community. Yours in fraternity, C. C. COTTRELL.

Cheer for the Tilling Swede.

SANTA CRUZ, CAL., Aug. 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The sample copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER at hand, and I am pleased very much with it. I desire to thank you and others. I am very glad to see that Mr. Lennstrand is kept pretty busy lecturing in different cities. Take courage, then, friend Vic. Be assured you are in the right place. Just act out your conviction of right, and the good work of reform will move on with accelerated speed.

Please find inclosed money order for $10—$2.50, one year, for my subscription, and $2.50, one year subscription to the inclosed address, and $5 for the following books: "Freethinker's Pictorial Text-Book," in cloth; the "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated," in cloth; "Priestly Celibacy Exposed;" "Crimes of Preachers;" "God in the Constitution," by R. G. Ingersoll; also Lithograph of Ingersoll, 22 x 28 inches.

Wishing you every success, I am yours for liberty, VICTOR LAINE.

If the Ceremonies of One Sect Are Excluded from the Schools, Those of the Other Should Be.

NEW YORK, Aug. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In the last issue THE TRUTH SEEKER justly says "that the American Protective Association should be as ardent in removing Bible reading from the schools as in excluding Catholic ceremonies." That is a good point to be considered. For how can an editor who justifies superstition and bigotry have a clear sight into the truth of other things?

Consistency is a jewel. I am in favor of the A. P. A. in putting down all superstition, and am opposed to all Catholic ceremonies, and would take all proper methods to eradicate the damned superstition out of the heads of the deluded dupes. But I would have consistency of purposes in the undertaking. The True American takes the snake by the throat, but dare not strangle it, and will not until it possesses Freethought to overcome prejudice and abolish creed and belief in the infallibility of the Bible and other inconsistencies. I am greatly interested in spreading Freethought throughout the land. The more we Freethinkers can show the people by reason and example the absurdity of believing the ipse dixit of paid humbugs of the day we may find reason and common sense to be marching on to victory. Yours truly, S. R. THORNE.

Going to Discredit the Great Witness of the Christians.

RUNNELS, IA., Aug. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find stamps for fifteen cents, for which send me "One Hundred and Forty-Four, Self-Contradictions of the Bible," as I want to answer those Christians who say, "That's what the Bible says." I want to impeach their witness.

The Infidels who are at all times ready to stand for the truth number four in the little town of Runnels. Three years ago the Christians would go out of their way to attack us; now they will go out of their way to avoid any argument with us. We have become the attacking party. We have them on the run.

At present I have the Pictorial Text-book, "The Gods," the Speech at the Trial for Blasphemy, and "Orthodoxy," also "Crimes of Preachers."

THE TRUTH SEEKER I regard as one of the necessities of life, and I am placing the copies where I think they will do the most good.

I am not able at present to pay for friend Putnam's book, "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," but am determined to have it as soon as I can get the money. JOSIAH BIVANS.

A Warm Admirer and Generous Giver.

SALEM, O., July 26, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have just received a letter from Samuel P. Putnam—one of the leading Freethinkers of the world, because he had the pluck to declare "Religion a curse, religion a disease, religion a lie." There is one man in the seventy-seventh year of his age that has the courage to say, I believe Putnam has spoken one of the grandest truths ever uttered by man, notwithstanding our brilliant star A. Augusta Chapman may think to the contrary. And I want you to send me $1 worth of his fearless pamphlets, and I will circulate them among the weak-kneed brethren who dare not speak above a whisper on religious subjects. He requested me to subscribe for his coming book on "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," which I had concluded to do before receiving his request. So you can put my name down for two of his books. I want one for myself and one for one of my best friends.

You can say to S. P. Putnam I give him the liberty to write my name on the roll of Freethought. Please send me Mr. Putnam's pamphlet on "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" as soon as you have it ready for distribution. I wish to take advantage of the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. I send you $3 for one year's subscription. Please find inclosed post-office money order for $20—$10 for Mr. Putnam, $1 for his pamphlets, $3 for the Library, and $6 for the Freethinkers' Congress. Please send me a list of the books that I may be entitled to, for I do not care for any that I now have. SIMON SHARP.

It Takes the Theologians Years to Do What We Do in Days.

WEST LIBERTY, IA., Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I see by an item in the column of "News of the Week" of the grand old TRUTH SEEKER that another Presbyterian college professor has gone by default. It seems strange it has taken these Christian wisacres all these long years to arrive at a disbelief in the inerrancy of the old scriptures. If they would only read Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" with an unbiased mind they would soon become convinced that the Bible, instead of being the word of God (if there is any), is nothing but a batch of bungled-together lies, unreliable history, and fables.

We had the pleasure of hearing J. E. Remsburg deliver his matchless lecture on "False Claims of the Church," in West Liberty Opera House. He is the first Liberal lecturer that has lectured here for twelve or fifteen years. He had a large and, I might say, an enthusiastic audience. We are working among the Liberals here to see if we cannot organize a league, as there is quite a number of Liberals around here. Some are outspoken, others prefer keeping still, but that is not how I feel over this work. We as Freethinkers will never be recognized as the powerful factor we are in this country till we do organize. Every earnest Liberal should be a self-constituted missionary in the cause of Freethought.

I have placed the last books I sent for in good hands, and now inclose $2.50 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for six months, one "Age of Reason," and one dozen of J. E. Remsburg's pamphlets on "False Claims." Please send me catalog and special prices for retail dealers in THE TRUTH SEEKER publications, and I will endeavor to get one of our newsdealers to handle them. I am, yours respectfully, J. HOBBS.

What Christian Will Answer?

ROCKVILLE, IDA., June 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I received and read your sample copy. Please send it for one year with the Freethinker's Badge-Pin, for which find inclosed $5. I should like to ask some questions through your paper, as I am a good Methodist, and want information. Why was Christ, the favored son and heir to the kingdom of heaven, always so unkind to his elder brother, Michael Lucifer Satan, nicknamed the devil? Did God need help to create man after he created the earth? To whom did he say, Let us make man? Did God have a wife? If so, why is she never mentioned? If not, how came he by so many sons? If Christ was the only begotten son of God, what about Isaac, Samuel, and John the Baptist, and lots of others whose mothers God visited? Was the first man whom God created after his own image and made male and female such a monstrosity as we call a hermaphrodite, or was he simply a tapeworm? Did the devil help God make man? What was he made of? If out of nothing, why was Adam made of dust, and Eve of a bone? Why is the person made of dust so much stronger than the one of bone, and why should he be any better? If some kind brother or sister in Christ will answer those questions, it may prove the salvation of one poor soul. I have read the Bible three times, but never read any Liberal books until lately. Brother Will Carlton lent me some of THE TRUTH SEEKERS.

A METHODIST.

A Noble Death to Die.

NEW FLORENCE, MO., Aug. 16, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Death would seem to entertain a spite against you if we may judge by his selection of victims in this region. As he takes off your staunchest, best, and most liberal supporters, and leaves those of us that are older and useless to you as being too poor or too stingy to patronize you to much extent. Some time ago I wrote you of the lamentable and untimely taking-off of Mr. Burlingame and wife by being run down in the night by a swift, wild railroad train. And now, it has become my painful duty to report the demise of your old subscriber and admirer, Mr. Pierre Foristell, of Foristell, Mo. (town named in his honor); stricken down in the prime of manhood and in the midst of a career of usefulness.

But he met death calmly and bravely and added one more to the many proofs I have had that an honest Infidel is not afraid to die. But his whole family were nearly crazed with grief for their terrible bereavement and irreparable loss, and hundreds of friends are saddened and sorrowful in sympathy.

Now, a few words more about the death of Mr. Burlingame. In my notice of that event I missed an important item, not having been fully informed. I learned later that he was off the track, but lost his life in an heroic effort to rescue his wife. Surely a grand transition to the "other shore," if there is such a thing. I would wish to go in some similar manner myself. We may well imagine his reception by the dwellers of that mysterious land to be like that imagined of Napoleon wherein "the kings in hades rose up to greet him." C. S. OSGOOD.

Results of Obeying "Search the Scriptures."

CINCINNATI, O., Aug. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: My first year's subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER has not yet expired, but as I happened to secure a new subscriber I inclose herein check for $5.

I have recently finished reading both the Old and New Testaments, which I believe only about ten per cent of the strong orthodox Christians can say, and I have arrived at the conclusion that he or she who can believe the book to be of divine origin can be induced to believe almost anything, even to the supremacy and infallibility of old man Pecci.

If I am to be damned because of my unbelief in the Bible absurdities and impossibilities, then damned I will be. What surprises me most is that women, whom the Bible grossly insults and makes slaves of, should be the principal support of the priests, while, in fact, they should throw the nasty book in the fire. If I were to approach a lady and address her in such language as is found in the following-named passages she would most certainly have me arrested, jailed, and prosecuted: Gen. xvi, 7, 8, 9; xix, 30-36; xxx, 1-15; xxxiv, 1, 2; xxxix, 7-20; xxxviii, 8, 9, 13-20; Numb. xxxi, 17, 18; Josh. vi, 21, 22; Judges xvi, 1; 1 Kings i, 1-4; xi, 3; 2 Sam. xi, 2-6; xvi, 21, 22; xiii, 10-14; Ruth iii, 3-11; Ezek. iv, 11-15; Song of Solomon vii, 1-4; Hosea i, 2. Of course these are only a few of the obscene passages which the Bible contains, but I am almost ashamed to have called attention to any of them.

Woman's path from servitude to liberty has been a long, heroic struggle for what little freedom she has acquired, still she is tied down and her hands are bound. Not until she discountenances the claims of the church whose slave she is, will she ever gain her hoped-for release.

Let the women withdraw their support from the church, and the clergy will have to seek some useful occupation to make a living. Take theology out of the world, and money squandered on superstition will to a great extent, if not fully, relieve all present wants. Let us hope that the future will bring forth a better class of people, that freedom and reason will be enthroned where now slavery and superstition reign supreme. Yours for right and reason, M. J. CUMMING.

Christ Is the One That Recanted.

CONDON, ORE., Aug. 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to write a few lines to your valuable paper that some able Liberal seeing may catch an idea and use it in a way that will make hell-fire screamers stop lying about Infidel death-beds. Admitting some do recant, they are poor, weak, sick humanity, racked with pain, and make no pretense of being gods. Jesus Christ recanted when he came to die—"My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?"

Infidels are more noble than Christians. They scorn to trade in the feelings of the heart-broken afflicted, or make stock of the agonized ravings of the suffering dying.

Some good, kind friend, interested in the salvation of my soul, for which with the gratitude of a true Infidel I thank him with all my heart, sent me a lot of Unitarian tracts and sermons, bracketing with lead pencil noble principles of their belief, indicating the goodness of the sender's character, if nothing more.

Unitarians believe in the divine inspiration of the Bible. I am an Infidel. We are getting good, very good, much better than we used to be. To illustrate: Benedict Arnold, a traitor, died in a foreign land, away from family, and without friends; he walked the floor in agony with the death-sweat on his brow. "Oh, my God! my life has been a mistake; had I done differently I might have been somebody, I would not be thus." And with these sayings he drops down dead; he is lost, lost, lost—gone to hell to burn forever and forever. Amen. Particularly is this true in the mind of America. Poor Arnold! I feel sorry for you. I pity you with all my heart. There are few of us that want to go to heaven and look down in hell and see your misery. This is to-day. Yesterday: David was a man after God's own heart. Elected to heaven and anointed with grease and and other filth till he is old and stricken in years, he gets no heat—in plain English, he is about to die. So he calls to him his boy Solomon that he may give him his blessing and crown, with some instructions concerning his sociability with one of his old neighbors. He says: "See to it, my son, that thou spare him not, but bring his old gray hairs down to the grave in blood." Think of it, my friends, with these feelings of murder and revenge in his heart he died and went to heaven. L. S. O.

A New Name—"Bunko-Steerers!"

GREYCOURT, N. Y., Aug. 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find a $1 note, for which please mail me one copy Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," one Wheeler's "Hard Knocks at Christianity," and one Remsburg's "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" (paper). Your paper and Freethought books suit me so well that, Oliver-like, I have to call for more.

I guess I am about the only one hereabouts who buys and reads your publications, as nearly all consider it a terrible sin to doubt the existence of that creation of sentiment, "Yahweh," or to think or say anything derogatory to his welfare, or the welfare of his pious bunko-steerers, the leaders of that band of organized credulity, the church.

It is sad to note the pernicious influence of religion on the common people. Taught early to implicitly believe in an absurd and ridiculous superstition; made to feel that doubt is a sin and investigation a crime; tortured by the fear of hell and deluded by the mirage of heaven—a condition never realized—it is not surprising that so many remain idly anchored to a creed, the prey of designing sky-pilots, and in intellectual attainments unable even to reach mediocrity.

A believer (a thorough gentleman, by the way, and a man of ability) recently said to me that he thought that "Gawd" in King David's time looked with indifference upon all forms of sin except the sin of idolatry. Very good. The orthodox will hardly admit such a toleration on the part of their idol to-day, for as civilization has increased the standard of moral excellence among men, so the standard of a deity has improved.

The God idea is therefore subjective rather than objective, being the creation of sentiment and having no real existence. When this important truth becomes generally recognized, we may anticipate the time when the old God of Christianity will have to abdicate, or navigate, and be relegated to his proper sphere of oblivion in the annals of mythology, along with Thor, Bacchus, Zeus, Siva, etc. Then the millennium will indeed appear; but for the present the irrepressible conflict between science and what Brother Putnam has so aptly denominated "a curse, a disease, and a lie," must be maintained.

PAUL S. TOOKER.

Prized Counsel.

RICHMOND, VA., Aug. 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have been an interested reader of your most valuable paper for eight or nine years, and am now the Richmond agent. I am a fervent believer in Freethought, and anxious to spread the theories taught throughout the columns of your most valuable and instructive paper; but I do not want you to think that I write these lines to teach you how to edit a paper or what to publish, for my aim is only to put the same question to you that has been asked of me by several people here who are readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER. And I thought it would be pleasing to the public as well as profitable to you, both now and in years to come.

You may think I am very "cheeky," but why don't some able writer devote one or two columns each week in THE TRUTH SEEKER to critical expounding of each chapter of the Bible, beginning with Genesis and continuing systematically through each chapter without omitting any one until the author has explained the last chapter of the book of Revelation?

Such an analysis of the holy book would make THE TRUTH SEEKER in great demand and much more valuable as an instructor.

And if you were to open a query column for correspondents so Christians could ask questions and give opinions through the columns of your paper, and thus put it on the basis of a Sunday-school paper, it would be read by many who do not now read it. This would cause many controversies which are now not fully brought out, and thus the readers of your paper would have many explanations which are not now given though universally believed. Each copy would then be anxiously looked for and carefully prized as valuable and instructive information concerning the salvation of mankind.

In years to come the back numbers would be called for and diligently read by all future investigators after the truth, and it would become a Bible-class journal, as all biblical questions might be asked and answered through its columns.

And as those articles would be continued from one week to another you would have many more regular subscribers, thus making it more popular and financially a success for the Truth Seeker Company.

Mr. Watson Heston could also assist most wonderfully with his most wonderful, marvelous illustrations, with each succeeding chapter, thus we might have a Bible-class class-book which would be circulated all over the globe and would eventually be of more interest to the public than any Sunday-school paper or Bible-class instructor now in use in the churches.

In after years you would have many applications for those back numbers in which the different chapters of holy writ were expounded, and the more issues it would be continued in the better for you, as it would not be of that class of trashy reading like continued-story papers, but would be of interest to all mankind, therefore a revenue to the benefit of the publishers.

In God We Rust.

ELSINORE, CAL., Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Some hardened wretch at Elsinore, Cal., has mutilated a number of silver dollars (worth "four bits") by removing the first "t" in the last word of the religious posy of our stereotyped piety, leaving the following fact to stare in the face of the pious, "In God We Rust." Now this radical change of sentiment, from superstition to fact, is a red rag to the truly good, which calls for gore, and as there is a law which prohibits the mutilation of coin, the offender will no doubt be sacrificed to the Lord under the auspices of the government if his identity can be determined. There is also a Constitutional provision which, if carried out, would prohibit the officers of the mint or the Congress from originally mutilating the coins of the United States by placing thereon the advertisement of any particular god. When our Constitution guarantees to each of us the right to exercise our own particular religious belief according to the dictates of our own consciences, it takes away the power of Congress or any officer of the government to make a religious bulletin-board of our coins by which to advertise any particular religious sect or group of religious sects. These coins are issued by the government for the use of all the people thereof.

To willfully violate this fundamental principle of our government by thus advertising a certain one of our gods is discrimination in favor of the business of a class who neither toil nor spin—unless the spinning of pious fish stories can be raised to the height of labor—and is a direct snub to the multitude of other gods which our people worship. While it is true the writer has not reached that degree of perfection wherein he has tied his faith to any of the gods which are worshiped by any of our people, he nevertheless believes in fair play. Serve all alike and let the fittest survive. Why should not Allah, Joss, Jehova, Kitche-manito, Unktahe, Montezuma, or any other of the gods which our people worship be fully advertised upon our coins. If a silver dollar contained a dollar's worth of silver, and was made rather thin, we could have room for them all, together with a statement that some of us do not "trust" any of them.

If the matter of trusting in some superstition must be engraved upon our coins, it should certainly be made so sweeping and general as to include us all.

What right has a coin which I pass you in payment of a debt to lie about what either of us believe? When I pay a Chinaman for washing my shirt, the coin which I give him bears the information that "we" trust in God, which is not true. He trusts in Joss, and I trust in E pluribus unum. Of course this little piece of sharp practice by the Christian to advertise his God to the exclusion of all others seems very nice and proper to him, but in reality only shows him to possess the qualifications of a swine, coupled with the prerogative disposition of a jackass to do things which in the end must inure to the benefit of his combined opposition. In order to obviate the calamity which this unqualified misrepresentation, "In God We Trust," is sure to bring upon the Christian, it is suggested that the double eagle be provided with one hog head and one jackass head, leaving the other advertisement off.

Of course, it is wrong to mutilate a coin—either by placing upon it profanity against all of our gods except one, or by afterward making it (by the erasing of a letter) to also include the advertised God in the profanity—and yet the law should, if it does not already, give each man, woman, and child in these United States a right to express her or his religious belief without improper restraint, if they have any such belief, and to say so if they have none. A man should certainly have a right to say "In God we rust" if, after having carefully read the history of Christianity, he is forced to conclude that science has been hindered and handicapped by it for sixteen hundred years, and that even now the church trembles with rage whenever a great discovery is made which proves some one of its pet delusions a fraud; but whether or not he has a right to say so by changing the lettering of a coin, is a matter which a test case would probably compel the people to raise up in their dignity and declare.

F. H. HEALD.

Reflections of the Bible God.

PITTSFIELD, MASS., Aug. 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: This Sunday morning finds me in the state of Massachusetts, a place where the viceregerents of God call upon his devotees to surrender their manhood and pocketbook to the Lord that his pulpiterers may live and grow fat and the people be kept in blind ignorance. Being a stranger here I concluded to attend church. Wishing some fruit to satisfy the demands of my stomach I looked in vain for a fruit stand, but learned that it was wicked to eat fruit in Massachusetts on Sunday, or at least to sell it on Sunday, and in consequence the Lord's will had closed the fruiterers' business on his holy day.

I had supposed until this time that "if one had no shoes he could go barefoot," it being a free country, but my memory reminds me that I am now in a land where I am liable to be burnt as a witch unless more favorable conditions surround me. As I feared more witches in the church than out, I at once returned to my room to read my Bible for fear of unjust accusations. The first chapter I opened to was Gen. xxxviii; it being a little mysterious, I fail to comprehend its true meaning and at once conclude it is like most of the intricate teachings of the scriptures, "only figurative," that no one is expected to understand it, yet must abide by it. This of course is easy to do, for we can follow that which we don't understand much better than that which we understand. I wish some "divinely inspired" divine would explain how the transaction of Judah was intended to elevate the "house of Judah" from which descended our "Lord and master." There can be no question but what Judah (as well as Solomon, David & Co.) was a very righteous individual and followed the spirit of the Lord, yet he seemed to be a little "muddled" in his righteousness in this case. I can easily understand where his licentiousness came from, he being a descendant of Adam and Eve, for unquestionably the dust that the Lord God made Adam of was poor dust and had never been screened or filtered; but how such sacredness, accompanied by carelessness on his part, could so "overcome" Judah at this time I know not.

Some one has hinted that "God's ways are not man's ways," and as man's ways are not at all times perfect, I have been trying to find deity to learn of him. I wish a real, live, sure-enough, merciful god, but can find none.

I used to bow in daily prayer to tell him how much I knew, what I wished him to do, and how to do it, but I never could see any great change in his management of affairs and I abandoned the scheme and turned my commission over to the Salvation Army, thinking that perhaps he would "lend an ear" to their understanding.

When at the Columbian Exposition in Chicago I saw what they said represented God, but as each country fashioned him differently and tells a different story, I have concluded that some one may be in error.

I do not wish such a God as Moses gives us, who creates a world of earthquakes, filled with pain and death, and then undertakes to lay the blame on poor Adam and Eve, when he himself had made them from dust of his own creating, knowing they would sin and that he in his infinit mercy would have to punish and kill them—yea, their children also. Further, that he would have to bring forth, "in a mysterious way," a son to suffer and die to appease his infinit wrath. All this is said to have been caused by a devil, whom God had previously made and who seems to have nearly equal power with God, which really gives us two gods—a good God and a bad god.

I only wish to learn of the good God, whom Moses partially describes in Ex. xiii, where the first-born of the parents must be killed to please the Lord. This is nothing unreasonable, for the Lord did the same thing himself and that by slow torture on the cross. Also Ex. xi and Num. xxi give us some idea of the goodness of the Lord.

I have often wished that Pharaoh's daughter had never fished the murderer Moses out of the bulrushes, for it is through him we are taught came the garden of Eden yarn, the ark story, where a little boat with only one window, twenty-two inches square, carried living animals of many times its own size and weight for one year, etc.

The web into which these yarns have been woven has caused many disasters. Millions have been burnt at the stake as heretics for non-belief, the Bastille was erected, nations and individuals have quarreled and fought and are still doing so. Yet the Lord's will must be done, and we sing:

Praise God from whom all blessings flow,
Praise him all creatures here below.

And still the birds fly to and fro on the Sabbath in search of worms (poor, innocent worms), the dogs bark, the cattle bellow, and the fish in the sea play tag among the boulders, just as if Moses had never been born. I am called an Infidel because I will not accept such a brute for a God as the Bible describes, but wish something better to feast my love upon. Justice is my god, Truth my redeemer, Pleasant Thought my paradise, and Home my heaven.

Children's Corner.

"Presbyterians."

[In the state of Pennsylvania there exists a small, sharp-stinging fly or gnat known as the "Presbyterian."]

You silly, airy, little prigs!
Sailing along with outspread wings,
Like ancient sloops or modern brigs!
Hurting our flesh with your sharp stings.

The blood of Methodists you seek,
(And they seek yours, you may be sure),
And, from a Papi's, fat and sleek,
You draw the life of his heart's core.

Your sect is known by shape and tint—
Sometimes, they say, your victims die,
Because your stinging has no stint—
O Presbyterians! fie, oh, fie!

Perhaps in Evolution's way,
You'll evolve to bird or beast;
Or, maybe—who that's wise can say?—
You may have been here, once, at least.

And worn blue stockings, bell-shaped hats,
A dozen, or, perhaps, a score—
And had your loves, and hates, and spats,
And sung your psalms, if nothing more.

But, never mind, oh, typic fly!
Of other flies, we all might tell,
How some are blue as any sky,
And some are black as any—well,

We will not rest on this or that,
Or how they each can make blood flow.
Judge no man only by his hat!
They all have records as you know.

Three Fairies.

"Oh, dear, dear! this is just the worst old world I ever saw! Everyone for himself, and nothing but trouble and trouble and trouble!" and poor little Hannah Downley began to cry.

"Pray how many worlds have you visited in the whole course of your natural existence?" inquired Hannah's half-sister, Myra. "I think it is a very good world indeed. Plenty to eat, plenty to wear, beautiful flowers blooming in the fields and meadows, birds singing in the trees, green grass waving in the wind, berries to be had for the picking, sunshine by day, and at night a lovely sky dotted with bright twinkling stars and a shining moon looking down upon a quiet, peaceful world—good friends watching over you—what have you to complain of?"

"Oh, it is beautiful to you, of course, because you are well, and have all your friends around you, but I am sick and all alone, and—and—helpless," and Hannah began to cry harder than ever.

Hannah was a poor little deformed girl and sickly. I call her a girl because she was small in stature and childish in her ways and manners, but in years she was a woman.

A long while ago her half-sister Myra was left motherless, and after a time her father married Hannah's mother. After Hannah was born, Myra, then a small child, was neglected. The stepmother cast her off, and she went about, shabbily dressed and altogether forlorn. One time her older brother came home from sea to find little Myra sitting on the doorstep crying at 10 o'clock at night. The stepmother had been gone all day, and locked Myra out, to get along the best way she could. Her father was away on a foreign voyage at sea, and, of course, knew nothing of the treatment his little girl was receiving. The big brother, indignant when he found his sister on the doorstep crying at that hour of the night, immediately took her to a boarding-place where she would be kindly treated. She never lived at home after that. When she grew to womanhood she married, and, although she met with many reverses, she was brave and courageous, and never stopped to waste time in repining, but just went right along working and singing cheerfully. She went away to live, and it was a good many years before she heard from her old home. Her father and big brother died, and then she no longer felt the same interest in her childhood's home as before. But one day there came word to her that her stepmother had died and that Hannah was left destitute, deformed and sickly. "It was probable," her informant said, "that Hannah would have to go to the poorhouse."

All Myra's sympathies were aroused, and although she was not well off herself in this world's goods, she resolved to take her orphaned half-sister under her own protection; so she made a journey to the town where Hannah was living, and took the feeble little girl-woman away with her to her own home. But she did not know the burden she had assumed, for Hannah had always been indulged by her fond mother, and petted greatly on account of her deformity and ill health, and, as is often the case, she had thus become selfish, fretful, petulant and exacting. She thought she had the hardest fate of anybody, and was the most ill-used person that ever lived. She was constantly repining over her hard lot, and finding fault with the world and everybody in general. "If you would only exert yourself a little," said Myra one day, "and try to forget your ailments you would be happier."

"But what can I do? You know I'm feeble, deformed, and miserable. I can't work. Oh, dear, such a hard life! I wish I was dead!" and Hannah began to cry again.

Thus it was, whine, whine, whine, cry, cry, cry, all day and half the night.

"If I were able to work, I don't know what I could do," she whined. "I have never been trained to do anything. Besides, there isn't anything to do here—" And after a pause she added: "Myra does it all."

"There's work enough to do if you've only a mind to do it," said a voice at her elbow.

Hannah jumped and gave a little scream. She saw no one and, with a beating heart, she whispered: "Who spoke?"

"I did," answered the voice.

"And who are you?" and Hannah's heart went thumpity-thump.

"I'm Closathand, a fairy friend," said the same voice.

Just then some one rapped on the door. "Why don't you go to the door?" squeaked another voice.

"Oh, dear, what was that?" and Hannah began to shake and quiver.

"My name is Nimblefoot, a fairy friend," was the answer, soft and low. "Come, come," it went on. "Go to the door, my dear."

Hannah made an effort, and opened the door. There stood a pretty little blue-eyed creature, all smiles and dimples, which she commenced to pluck from her face and throw at Hannah.

Smiles and dimples fell all around her, like rose leaves blown by summer breezes, and once in a while one would hit her face and stick there.

"Catch them! Catch them! They're all for you," said Closathand, who sat perched on the back of Hannah's chair.

"Oh, I can't," whimpered Hannah. "I'm a poor, sickly, deformed girl—I can't do anything at all. Oh, I wish I was dead!"

"Giv that fellow a kick," said Nimblefoot, dancing up to Hannah. "Here's my foot, at your service," and he handed her his own foot and leg.

"It isn't a fellow that's—that's talking—it is I, Hannah Downley. I'm a poor, feeble, sickly, deformed—"

"You may think it is yourself," interrupted Nimblefoot, "but you can't see the fellow as I do. I tell you it is old Croniegrumbler, a blind old dwarf, crossgrained and peevish, and he is trying to make you look just like him."

"And he is awful-looking," said the pretty little blue-eyed creature, still throwing smiles and dimples. "If you can catch these smiles and dimples, you can make him go away. I would if I were you, for if you do not get rid of him soon he will just stay with you forever, and he's very disagreeable company."

"Oo-ooo!" groaned Croniegrumbler. "She won't get rid of me so easy. This is a nasty old world, anyway, but I have to stay in it, as old and rotten as it is. Hannah is my property, I'd have you know, and I stay with her all the time. I eat with her and I sleep with her. I'll not desert Hannah, and I will stay with her just as long as she stays in this mean old world." And he made a terribly ugly grimace.

"You'd better keep your distance," said the first little fairy. "Remember I am Closathand."

"And I am Laftoff," chimed the blue-eyed, dimpled, smiling fairy, still throwing smiles and dimples.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Hannah. "Such a dreadful life! Such an awful old world!" "Such an awful old world," repeated Croniegrumbler, echoing her words.

"If I had something to do, perhaps I might do a little, but Myra does all the work—oh, dear!"

"Look here!" said Closathand, and with a stick he pushed a basket of stockings right under Hannah's nose.

"They're full of big holes," sighed Hannah.

"Darn 'em!" whispered Nimblefoot.

Hannah very reluctantly took a needle, and, strange to say, went to work.

Croniegrumbler made her prick her finger with the needle, at which she groaned, and he groaned too.

"Never mind!" said Laftoff. "Try again. You're doing bravely," and she flung a smile which hit Hannah right in the middle of her rosy lips.

Pretty soon every hole in the basket of stockings had disappeared. Hannah did not feel very tired, and had not found a bit of fault for the good hour that she was engaged in work. Then she went out in the nursery, and found the floor all littered up with dust and crumbs, where the children had been eating and playing.

"Sweep!" exclaimed Nimblefoot.

"Don't you do it," exclaimed Croniegrumbler.

"Do it," said Closathand. "I'll help you."

"And so will I," said Laftoff.

So she swept the room, and dusted the furniture.

At that moment Myra came in. "Why, child, are you crazy?" she inquired.

"Yes, she is! And it's a mean old world," growled Croniegrumbler.

"She is just coming to her senses," whispered Nimblefoot.

"I thought I'd turn over a new leaf and see if it would not read better than the old one." And as Hannah spoke, Closathand threw a shower of smiles and two pretty dimples in her face and eyes.

Myra was so pleased she hardly knew how to express herself. Such a change as appeared in Hannah's face and conduct! "Why," said she, espousing the basket of stockings, "why, Hannah, you've mended the stockings!"

"Yes," laughed Hannah, "I thought there was nothing for me to do, but Closathand, that little fairy there, pushed the basket right under my nose, and I thought I would do the stockings, and then you wouldn't have them to do. Oh dear, oh dear, my head aches," and she began to cry.

"That's the talk!" groaned Croniegrumbler. "Go ahead! It's a mean, nasty old world."

"No such thing!" said Laftoff, pelting Hannah with another shower of smiles and dimples.

"Kick that silly old dwarf out of doors!" said Nimblefoot, handing Hannah his leg and foot once more.

Closathand gave him a push, and the dreadful-looking dwarf hobbled away without further notice.

Hannah then took a survey of the three fairies. Laftoff was dressed beautifully in pink silk and white lace ruffles, pink silk stockings, and pink shoes. When she smiled her face dimpled all over, and she was so merry that she made everybody around her just as happy as it is possible to imagine.

Nimblefoot was a youth who appeared to be always hopping about, but somehow he very seldom hopped into mischief. Sometimes he did, for, he said, he was not perfect any more than anybody else. He wore a tunic and pants of blue velvet, and had a blue velvet cap on his head that was covered with short yellow curls. His cheeks were very red, and his eyes very bright. He said he kept them so by stirring about and trying to find something useful to do.

Closathand was dressed in white velvet trimmed with gold lace, and, instead of a cap, wore a gold crown on his head set with pearls and diamonds. He was a handsome youth, too. He said he won the crown by always doing that work which was nearest. He told Hannah that there was just such a crown for her, if she would persevere in the work that waited nearest her hand, the same as she had mended the stockings and swept the room, and that it was the homely little duties that seemed so small and slight which, in the end, made the great work of the world.

Croniegrumbler poked his head in the door, and groaned, "'Tis a mean, nasty old world—Oo-ooo!"

Nimblefoot handed his foot and leg to Hannah, and told her he would make them a present to her to kick the old dwarf out of doors whenever he made an appearance.

"You can give them back to me," said he, "as soon as he departs for good."

But Hannah, not wishing to deprive him even for a short time of two such useful members, replied, laughing:

"I will keep him away with my own foot."

"Then you will belong to the Nimblefoot family, sure," said the fairy, smiling graciously.

"If you can get clear of Croniegrumbler," said Laftoff, "I will give you this golden arrow"—taking a lovely arrow of gold from a quiver full of the same kind.

"The more smiles and dimples you can catch, the farther off will go Croniegrumbler, and as long as you keep this golden arrow, whose name is Good Will, you will not feel like entertaining such a creature as Croniegrumbler. I like you so much," she added, "that I will give you two more arrows. They are of gold, and set with jewels. One is called Love and the other Patience, and with these three—Love, Patience, and Good Will—I think you can conquer, not only yourself, but all the world; but you must keep a smiling face all the time."

All this transpired in a much shorter time than it has taken me to write it, and when Hannah awoke—for she had been asleep and dreaming—she saw that Myra was asleep, too. It was a very sultry day, and Myra had leaned back in her chair and was sound asleep, with a darning-needle in her hand and a basketful of stockings before her.

Creeping softly along, Hannah took the needle and mended all the stockings before Myra awoke. Then she went noiselessly and swept the nursery, as she had dreamed.

Myra awoke, and said just the same words that Hannah had dreamed she said. Then Hannah related her dream.

"Wasn't it funny, Myra? But I see now how naughty, fretful, and faultfinding I have been. You are so good and patient with me. And you were so kind to take me in when I had no home. My mother cast you off when your mother died, but you took me in and cared for me. I will turn over a new leaf, and be as good and kind to everybody as you have been and are to me." And Hannah looked as if she meant what she said.

"And may the three good fairies be always near to help you," said Myra.

Hannah's face appeared as if Laftoff had thrown another shower of smiles and dimples, and Myra said Croniegrumbler would never dare approach that smiling face, sure. And he didn't. S. H. W.

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been reduced so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone
—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 160 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets,
Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Material of Human History

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parent-less, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and a reputable hypocrite. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world.
Price, 25 cents. Address

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.
We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this.
The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS)

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it:
"This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science.
In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment;
Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer.
Every page glows with passion and throbs with life.
Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin.
In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'In This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Litiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abs-con; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

I have never risen from the perusal of any work by this prolific author with greater satisfaction than this one which is now before me. It is written in Mr. Remsburg's own style, a style peculiar to himself. The authorities upon both sides of this much-vexed question are given, thus allowing an impartial reader to form his or her opinion as to the views held by Lincoln regarding religious matters. It is indeed a significant fact, as Mr. Remsburg says in chapter iii, page 54, "of the twenty witnesses whose testimony is given in chapter i, ten admit that during a part of his life Lincoln was an unbeliever, or Infidel. Of the remaining ten not one denies the fact." Thus the author declares with authority that Lincoln's Infidelity is not denied even by those who have strenuously labored to prove the contrary. With Lincoln, as with all great men whose private opinions were known to be adverse to the Christian creed, no attempt whatever is made to claim his allegiance to such a creed until after he is dead and gone and unable to bear witness to the truth or falsity of such claims. Would the Christian world have been so eager to claim "America's most illustrious son" as a Christian had he died some poor, humble, and obscure citizen?

Lincoln was a great man, a good man, and as orthodox Christians cannot understand that goodness may spring from any man, be he Christian or not, they assume with a coolness amounting almost to audacity that all good men must therefore be Christians, especially should greatness be coupled with it. On page 16 the author enumerates the particular "religious views Lincoln is said to have held by those who affirm that he was a Christian." Of these there are eight, and sixteen are given of an opposite tendency. Of the former, the third statement avers that, "He believed that the Bible is a revelation from God—the only revealed will of God."

Had this view of the Bible really been held by Lincoln, then in very truth he could never have conscientiously signed the emancipation proclamation. The Bible teaches and upholds slavery; Lincoln detested it with all the bitterness of which his nature was capable; evidently Lincoln could not believe the Bible to be "the only revealed will of God," and oppose the slave traffic as earnestly as he did. From his proved actions, those actions which now play an important part in the history of America, Lincoln did not believe the Bible to be as stated above; hence we are driven by the logic of fact to the same conclusion as the author—that Lincoln was not a Christian. The "hitherto unpublished testimony of William H. Herndon," as given by the author on page 113, is valuable indeed in assisting him in his work. This authority here quoted was for nearly forty years a personal friend of Lincoln. The testimony of this witness should have great weight upon the controversy concerning Lincoln's religious belief. He was certainly in a position to learn Lincoln's personal characteristics, and to use his own words, as quoted by the author, he declares that, "in 1843 we entered into a partnership which was never formally dissolved." Who, then, could have known Lincoln better? And yet on page 117 this witness further states that Lincoln "was a scientific materialist." On the strength of such testimony we may feel safe in declaring that Lincoln was neither Christian nor Spiritualist. Scientific Materialism is a system of philosophy antagonistic to both; it differs as widely from either as the direction of the poles. It is the very furthest philosophy from Christianity, and by the aid of such testimony we are assured that Lincoln was not a Christian. The overwhelming mass of evidence the author has put in this volume to show that Lincoln held no ideas in common with orthodox Christianity is significant, as against the great discrepancies in the dates of his alleged conversions. On page 311 we are told that "One witness states it was in 1848, one that it was in 1858, another that it was in 1862, another in July, 1863, and still another that it was in November, 1863." If each of these witnesses is substantially correct, Lincoln was converted five different times, and at each conversion he must have fallen back to his "scientific Materialism." Evidently they are not all speaking the truth; four of them must be in error, and very probably they all are. We cannot believe them all, and as no reliance can be placed upon either, we still adhere to our former position, that Lincoln never was converted—i.e., not a Christian. Again, on page 266 we are told that "It is a matter of history that in 1834, at New Salem, Ill., Lincoln read and circulated Volney's 'Ruins' and Paine's 'Age of Reason,' giving both books the sincere recommendation of his unqualified approval." Lincoln's Infidelity is thus established beyond dispute, for no man who claims to be a Christian can "sincerely recommend with unqualified approval" either of the above works, both of which, in Lincoln's time, were considered decidedly Infidel works. And the farce increases when interested persons will, in our day, insist upon asserting such a claim for him.

Numerous authorities are quoted, all in the same strain, throughout the entire book, which could only be obtained by long and patient study and investigation. One hundred and twenty witnesses are examined, and we are to judge the religious views of Lincoln by the testimony offered. The twenty aver that he was a Christian, the one hundred, that he was not. The bulk of the evidence is against the claims made by the orthodox church and confirms us in our belief that Lincoln was not, and never was, a Christian. The work is valuable as correcting an important matter in American history and not as favoring any system of religious belief. It should have a wide circulation.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH.

A DANGEROUS BOOK.

Having just read "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" permit me to say that in many respects I regard it as the most valuable contribution yet made to Freethought literature.

As a rule Christians positively refuse to read Infidel publications, and nine-tenths of the world's people, while unconsciously leaving more or less to Christianity, are too indifferent and unconcerned to investigate either one side or the other. How to reach them all is the question. Here is a work that solves the problem. It deals with a subject of peculiar and thrilling interest to every person, young or old, who ever heard spoken the name of Abraham Lincoln. Those who could not be coaxed or hired to read any other Infidel book will pick this one up and read it with increasing interest from beginning to end.

With captivating courtesy and a spirit of fairness that cannot fail to charm and disarm the most obdurate Christian, Mr. Remsburg presents in the first chapter of his work the testimony entire on the Christian side of the case. Having devoured this with the utmost satisfaction the Christian reader will boldly and confidently rush on only to find himself at the close thoroughly surprised, ambushed, disappointed, discomfited, demoralized, and "done up"—his faith shipwrecked and his idols broken to fragments.

It is a well-baited and well-set trap, admirably calculated to catch even the most wary Christian. To the average man exclusively logical, philosophical, or argumentative writings are Greek—an "unknown tongue." Give them the drama of real life as an object-lesson, illustrating the fact that man attains goodness and greatness only as he rises above the narrow, dwarfing, demoralizing confines of sectarian, priest-made religions, and they will understand and appreciate it.

The world's sages and thinkers, its good and its great men, its philanthropists and its saviors, its broad-minded and its lovable men, have been and are necessarily Infidels. Its narrow bigots, its cruel persecutors, its bloody butchers, and its inhuman monsters, have been and are necessarily sectarian religionists, mostly Christians. Lincoln's goodness and greatness was, after all, the best proof of his Infidelity.

The world owes John E. Remsburg a debt of gratitude for defeating Christianity in its base attempt to rob Infidelity of one of its brightest jewels.

Every Liberal in America should possess this work, in durable binding, and pass it round where it will do the most good. It is a "dangerous" book.

Leavenworth, Kan. S. R. SHEPHERD.

This book of Remsburg's ought effectually to settle the question regarding Lincoln's belief in Christianity. It gives all the arguments pro and con, and extinguishes and wipes out every effort made by the unduly zealous to claim "Honest Old Abe" as a believer in a savior, a "sweet Jesus," or any other of the old Christian myths and fables. He did not believe in a vicarious atonement, in forgiveness of sin (a violation of nature's laws), but that penalty must follow transgression. He did not believe in a special creation, but in evolution; he did not believe in the divinity of the Bible, in miracles, or special providence, but in law unchanged and unchangeable. Some people will insist that all good deeds, generous deeds, and benevolent deeds are Christian deeds. Even I, Infidel and Atheist as I am, have often been called a good Christian by pious people who consider good works a proof of Christianity. This effort of the church to claim all it believes good, true, and worthy has stigmatized many noble workers as Christians when they themselves dislike and despise the name. But I think this work of Remsburg's—over 336 pages of carefully collected facts—will forever settle the question as to Lincoln being a Christian. It will in all honest, candid minds.

Like Paine, Voltaire, and Emerson, he had some sort of a God—a vague unknown, unknowable something he called God, but nothing at all in the shape of a Christ or a savior.

He knew an honest man was ready to face his own deeds and would feel degraded at the bare idea of another suffering for his errors and mistakes.

Lincoln was too good, true, and honest to be a Christian, and every thinker will be glad that "Our Remsburg" has proved this to be emphatically and irrevocably so.

I hope all true Liberals will help to circulate this book far and wide. It shows so plainly Christian methods of manufacturing proof (?) of what they desire, rather than what is actually so.

One is startled as he reads the seeming facts of the piety of Lincoln as pictured by priests and pious panders to popular prejudice, and wonders how it can be nullified and made void, it seems so well and so carefully substantiated. But wrapping after wrapping is removed, and at last Truth in her majestic nobleness stands naked and unveiled, pure and sublime.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENER.

"Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?"—this is the title of Mr. J. E. Remsburg's latest and, one might add, best work, since it settles for all time the much-mooted question of Abraham Lincoln's Christianity. Ever since the lips of our martyred hero have been sealed in death Christian cormorants have been busy certifying to falsehoods and claiming this noble and gifted leader and statesman as their own. For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been gathering facts and data to prove the contrary of this. He has done his work well—none could do better. He presents an overwhelming array of proofs from known and intimate friends of Lincoln, from eminent scholars, business associates, statesmen, life-long comrades, relatives, and others, all showing conclusively that the great benefactor of the human race never entertained Christian ideas.

Mr. Remsburg has conferred a great benefit upon the reading and thinking people in giving this carefully prepared and true statement to the public. The book is a sturdy defender of the dead, an eloquent appeal for truth and justice. It is neatly bound, of good type and paper, and comprises 336 pages of interesting evidence, proving beyond doubt that Abraham Lincoln was a staunch Freethinker. It is to be hoped that the sale of this book will be commensurate with its value. Everyone should possess a copy in order to refute the untrue statements circulated by the Christian world.

SUSAN H. WIXON.

I have just finished reading this very interesting book, in which the author clearly proves the late president a Liberal—perhaps not an Atheist, but an outspoken Agnostic, not at all fearful in the use of words very significant of unbelief in the Christian creed.

The style of the book, indeed its whole make-up, is admirable. As a biography, it equals in painstaking exactness the biographies of our much-lamented friend, James Parton; and like Mr. Parton, Mr. Remsburg finds in his subject so much to interest the reader, that after reading the entire three hundred and thirty-five pages he unwillingly lays it aside, feeling that the book, "Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?" is one of the volumes which he must have for his home library, so that he can turn to its pages and read it at his leisure. The humor of President Lincoln was rich, and Mr. Remsburg does not detract from its spiciness in relating it.

Gems of Thought.

THE secret of happiness is to moderate your desires.—Voltaire.

"It is strange," a judicious reader is apt to say, upon perusal of these wonderful histories, "that such prodigious events never happen in our days." But it is not strange, I hope, that men should be in all ages. You surely have seen instances enough of that frailty. You have yourself heard many such marvelous relations started, which, being treated with scorn by all the wise and judicious, have at last been abandoned even by the vulgar. Be assured that those renounced lies, which have spread and flourished to such a monstrous height, rose from like beginnings; cut, being sown in a most proper soil, shot up at last into prodigies almost equal to those which they relate.—Hume's Essay on Miracles.

MEN are continually mourning over heresy who are cheating widows out of their inheritance and making business men bankrupts by their selfishness. All our fine scholarship and philosophy will not avail much, unless they teach men to pay one hundred cents on the dollar and to produce a dividend here and now. Talk as we please about the superficiality of some men who seem to ignore poetry and idealism in the interest of simple good works, they will assert their right to be heard as teachers and even iconoclasts, until we can show some practical result of our fine idealizing in common, every-day honesty. Even morality in the lowest sense will be a broader principle than ever religion has been, if it touches the everyday miseries and wants of needy men and women.—S. J. Stewart.

It is popularly supposed that belief in a personal deity gives a certain exaltation, serenity, fortitude, hope, and even joy in hours of darkness and calamity, and holds us to high aims; and that, under any cosmic theory, society would sink into barbarism and bestiality. The claim, in my judgment, cannot be maintained. At all events, the sentiment of the legend of Abou Ben Adhem is truer. "The greatest motives of the soul are purely social products, are born of communion with actual and idealized human beings, and not with superhuman; and they will flourish and decay, as respect for human rights increases and declines." As well fear that the denial of the old conception of light as a separate entity will involve the world in darkness, and the assertion that heat is only molecular motion will bring an Arctic climate, or at least make the comforts of the fireside forever impossible to the denier of caloric and phlogiston.—E. D. Stark.

AMONG those who have been obliged to abandon not only the trinitarian conception of Jesus, but the supernatural conception of him, even in the mildest form, I often notice what I think Dr. Channing would call "a swollen way of talking about Jesus," if he were with us now. It is the talk of men who do not wish to be left behind by supernaturalists in their verbal homage of Jesus. So they reiterate that Jesus was the greatest of mankind. They call him the ideal man, the perfect man, and so on. Now, if there is anything that I despise it is the disposition which many persons manifest to disparage greatness. For myself, I love to believe in greatness and to rejoice in it. But I cannot see that our knowledge of Jesus and of all other men is so exhaustive that we have a right to predicate his absolute superiority over all other men. I see that, in the evolution of history, his is the most commanding position and the most stupendous influence ever exerted by one man; but concerning his moral perfection I do not care to dogmatize.—Chadwick.

It has been frequently stated or implied that Secularists wish to destroy morality. But this is a most absurd slander. No sane man ever dreams of such a policy. Destroying virtues—real, useful virtues—from among mankind in order to make men happier, would, indeed, be the maddest of follies; though a folly, by the way, of which Christianity is far from being guiltless, as witness its systematic repression of intellect and self-reliance, and its fundamental advocacy of the passive virtues, or rather vices ("other-worldliness," covetous prayerfulness, reckless improvidence, submission to wrong, and tyranny, and so forth), as contrasted with its condemnation or neglect of courageous, thoughtful, prudent, active virtues, so highly valued among the hardy and enterprising gentile races. The word Christianity is often thoughtlessly used as a synonym for moral excellence. Men teach moral goodness and call it Christianity, when it is nothing of the kind. Their moral judgment shapes their Christianity, more than Christianity shapes their moral judgment.—Religion in Schools.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

News of the Week.

THE number of unemployed is great.

RUSSIA had last week 4,328 new cases of cholera and 1,711 deaths.

At New Haven, Conn., on the 26th ult., the rabbi and congregation of a synagogue had a violent fight in church.

RACHEL BOYLE, of Philadelphia, during religious excitement cut off a part of her lip and broiled it as an offering to God.

On the 26th ult. the citizens of Toronto voted on Sunday running of street-cars, and defeated it. The vote was one of the largest ever polled there.

It is said that that there has been contemplated a move upon Washington of half a million of the unemployed from the West and all parts of the country. The object would be to force Congress, by a tremendous demonstration, to relieve the needy classes.

THE Peace Congress at Chicago sent this telegram to President Cleveland and Queen Victoria: "The World's Peace Congress of Chicago sends equal congratulations to Great Britain and America on the triumph of arbitration as a substitute for war, exemplified in the recent Behring sea decision, cementing the friendship of both nations and full of happiest augury for mankind."

THE Friendship African Baptist church at Aiken, S. C., was burnt on the night of the 19th ult. A colored exhorter had been preaching there and dealt very severely with the Methodist congregation which meets across the street. The fire was evidently incendiary, and while it raged the Baptists accused the Methodists of setting the church on fire to revenge themselves on the exhorter. A riot was narrowly averted.

At the Jesuit church of St. Francis Xavier, New York, the prior of the Carmelite fathers a few days ago made these remarks: "Protestantism is so split up at the present time that its adherents do not know where they stand. They deny the authenticity and inspiration of the scriptures. They must confess that they are routed and beaten. At present there are only two forces remaining—Agnosticism and Catholicity, Infidelity and Catholicism. You must be a Catholic or you must be an infidel."

A NUMBER of persons continue to protest against the dances of the females of several Oriental nations at the Midway Plaisance in the World's Fair. The directors promise suppression of the objectionable features, but do not fulfill their word. The most criticised exhibit is the dance du ventre, which term translated means dance of the stomach, or stomach dance. The dancer has her abdomen semi-nude, and moves it, and at other times the muscular part of her buttocks, in ways expressive of passion.

RUSSIA took especial pains to shine at the recent international naval display in New York waters. After the display she sent over yet more ships, which had they been here during the review would have made her exhibit bigger than that of any other power. It is said that she looks to the favor of the United States in event of a Russo-British war. It is said by some that we should favor her, even to the extent of condoning her home tyrannies, because of her record of friendly acts to us in the past. For instance, when during our Rebellion England appeared about to take the part of the Confederate States, Russia sent war-ships to these waters, which were said to be under instructions to open on our side at England's first hostile demonstration. But others urge that Russia's motive has been only enmity of England, and indeed that no personal services to us should render us so partial as to ignore the cries of the oppressed in Russian dominions.

On the 19th ult. G. T. Seigel, of Parkersburg, W. Va., accompanied by J. Finley Brown, who is said to be an active member of the American Protective Association, went to the Convent of the Good Shepherd at Columbus, O., to get his two daughters. While they were at the convent a crowd of about two hundred gathered on the outside. The impression prevailed that the girls were unlawfully detained, and threats were made against the sisters in charge, which led to an effort to force the door. While the lock was being out the mother superior appeared, opened the door, and asked what was wanted. One member of the mob sprang forward as if to strike her. The two girls told their father in the presence of the sisters that while they loved him, they were being well treated and preferred to remain where they were. This did not satisfy the mob, which had worked itself into a paroxysm of rage. Much feeling has grown out of the incident and grave fears of a conflict between the Catholic and anti-Catholic factions are felt.

A WARNING TO JESUITISM.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. H. H. Land, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim—a promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-axe from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

FACTS AND FICTIONS OF LIFE.

CONTENTS.

Preface.	Sex in Brain.
The Fictions of Fiction.	Heredity in Its Relations to a Double Standard of
A Day in Court.	Morals.
Thrown in With the City's Dead.	Divorce and the Proposed National Law.
An Irresponsible Educated Class.	Lawsuit or Legacy.
The Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity.	Common Sense in Surgery.
Woman as an Annex.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degenerating sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

The True Ground of Right and Wrong.

In a late number we said that the true object of moral action is happiness. This principle will do better with some explanations. A vital point is, whose happiness. It is not meant that the individual's happiness alone is to be considered. A person on throwing aside the old standards of custom and religion, and learning that the true standard is happiness, is not to plunge forward into any conduct that makes him happy, regardless of its consequences to others, and think that he is doing right. Indeed, no persons who have received even a small bit of Freethought training do. Once in a while, to be sure, an individual who has thought far enough to see the falseness of the orthodox standards, and to perceive dimly that happiness is the real standard, carelessly stops thinking here and does not press on to obtain a clear idea of the new criterion. He thinks that only his own happiness is to be considered. Christians say that every Infidel does like this one. But this is not so; as we have just said, it is only one here and there that does so. However, even this one here and there must be correctly instructed and saved to the ranks of the well-doers. So let it be understood that the proper test of conduct is its promotion of the happiness not of the individual alone, but of all mankind.

Another caution is often needed. Even in a willing and would-be honest employment of this test, a certain mistake is apt to be made. In seeing to it that his action is favorable to the happiness of others, a person often reckons in only one or two individuals as all of those others. But every action affects not only the two or three persons most conspicuous in it, but all of the race. The consequences of every action are far-reaching.

Theologians of course have always opposed this doctrine of morals as they have everything else true. Handling it under the term of "the doctrine of expediency," one pietist admits that "whatever is expedient is right," but, he objects, the action "must be expedient on the whole, at the long run, in all its effects, collateral and remote, as well as those which are immediate and direct. Now, this is undoubtedly true, to a being capable of estimating all effects, direct and indirect, collateral and remote, through all time, and upon all beings—and to such a one alone. No person can safely act upon this principle, in questions of right and wrong, but one who can take into view the boundless future. Now, it need not be proved that none but God has this perfect foreknowledge; no one else can, therefore, safely act upon the principle of expediency." Nevertheless, we will assure this writer, this very doctrine of expediency is the one that the whole race is growing to act on more and more every day, and much more "safely" than it ever has acted on any other. That we can ever attain perfect safety in the application of the principle is of course impossible, but neither can we in any class of our actions. It is admitted that reason is at the best short-sighted and erring, and must every now and then lead us astray in our essays to estimate "all effects, collateral and remote as well as those which are immediate and direct." But reason leads us astray just as often in other matters as in ethical, and yet we do not abandon its use; we cannot abandon it; it is all we have to go by in matters of morals or any ones at all.

Our object is to start people to thinking on ethical subjects. We have overthrown the old moral code, and have a new one to erect. There is in the subject pleasant and profitable food for thought every hour of one's life.

The Present Policy of the Catholic Church in America.

Not all of our readers are aware that there are two parties among the Catholic churchmen of America, one rightly orthodox and traditional and the other progressive. The former strives to perpetuate in unmodified strictness the ancient policies and usages of the church. The latter desires to accommodate these policies and usages somewhat to the new influences and interests of the time. It would have the church pay some deference to science, and to the claims of citizenship and the cause of the public schools. It does not approve of the saying, "I am a Catholic first and an American afterward;" and it equally disfavours extreme severity against the public school system.

The lines between these two parties have been drawn with sharpness during the last three or four months. This was over the school question. The pope sent what seemed to be a command to discontinue the infliction of the final penalties upon Catholic parents who send their children to other than parochial schools. This seemed a triumph for the liberal party in the church. But the papal injunction was very vague in its expression, and the conservatives proclaim that it does not mean what the liberals would make it out to. Indeed, Freethinkers do not believe that there will be any actual change in Rome's school policy at all. They deem the utterances of seeming liberality to be but devices to lull the hostility of those who have become indignant at papal aggressions.

On these two points—of party division in the Catholic church of America, and specifically, division over the school question—our readers will learn more by perusing the latest utterance of Father Brandi, of Rome. This is a deliverance of some weight. In the interpretation of papal pronouncements, this Rev. Father Brandi, famous Jesuit controversialist, is recognized as the highest authority; and he also is always put forward to reply to the attacks on the doctrine of the church, and has the fullest access to the documents and persons giving light on the respective subjects. He is the authoritative interpreter to whom all outside the circle of the highest illumination, such as bishops, archbishops, monsignors of the various degrees below cardinal, give respectful adhesion. He was put forward to reply to the articles in the Contemporary Review, and has now published, in the Civita Cattolica, organ of the order, his dictum on the school question in the United States, headed "A New Pontifical Confirmation of the Parochial Schools in America." It is followed by the text of the pope's letter to Cardinal Gibbons "on the controversy about the public and parochial schools of the United States," which the reverend father says "has been received with grateful mind and applause by all who were and are, here [in Rome] or elsewhere, strenuous defenders of an education strictly Catholic for the Catholic youth in Catholic schools. Nor could it be otherwise, it being known to all that on such an education depends in great part the true and genuine well-being not only of individuals, but also of the family, the state, and the church." Father Brandi consistently and with his whole soul sustains the most uncompromising adherence to the rigid doctrine of the church as it is defined by the papal bulls and rescripts, defiant of all the temporizing and compromising weaknesses which maintain the nominal boundaries of the Catholic Roman church at the cost of its discipline and compactness. He has no patience with the Catholics who question—he recognizes nothing but the most implicit acceptance of the authority of the church, and will have none of the modern liberalization of it. Therefore he says:

"Our readers are not ignorant how the bitter struggle for the existence of the Catholic school, and the principles on which it is founded, has been in the United States, especially during the last two years, sustained not only against the attacks of the secret societies, which there not less than in Europe, animated by a Satanic fury, do everything to pervert the education of the youth, but also and chiefly against certain laicizing Catholics, who, under the pretense of patriotism, reaching a friendly hand to the enemies of the church, seem to desire to subordinate in the school the religious good to the civil good, and fully approve, against the decrees of the popes and the prescriptions of the plenary council of Baltimore, such a method of educating the youth as should be divided from the Catholic faith and from the authority of the church."

That there exists in the United States such a party among the Catholics he considers a grave and painful fact, and he stigmatizes the Western Watchman as a sacrilegious assailant of the true doctrines of the church, associating with it the Colorado Catholic of Denver, the Catholic Union and Times of Buffalo, the Northwestern Chronicle of St. Paul, the Freeman's Journal of New York, and the Catholic Times of Philadelphia. To put a stop to the propaganda of the pernicious principles of these pseudo-Catholics, the father undertakes to comment on the letter of the pope to which reference has been made; and it is assured (says a writer from Rome to the New York Post, to which paper we are indebted for this account of the father's declaration) that what Father Brandi says is what the Vatican means, and what must be accepted by all who desire to remain in the grace of the church. The letter, he shows, must be accepted as the sole and indiscussible rule by which all Catholics must be guided on the question involved, being, not the teaching, either theoretical or practical, of a prelate or private teacher, but the decision of the head of the church, intended to put an end to the dissensions and disputes which have existed on the subject of the schools. These are the authoritative words of the pontiff:

"For the rest, in order that there may remain in the future no reason for doubt or clash of opinions in a matter of so great gravity, as we have already declared in our letter addressed on the 23d of May of the past year to the venerable brethren, the archbishop and bishops of the ecclesiastical province of New York, so again, as far as is necessary, we declare that the decrees established according to the rules given by the holy see through the councils of Baltimore, in regard to the parochial schools, as well as all that the Roman pontiffs, either directly or through the sacred congregations, have prescribed on the same subject, are to be constantly observed."

There follows a résumé of the history of the councils of Baltimore, with quotations from their decrees, insisting upon the retention in the hands of the clergy of the education of the Catholic youth. "We exhort the bishops," says the first council, "and, in view of the grave evils which habitually proceed from a not well-instructed youth, we conjure them by God's bowels of mercy to endeavor to found in their respective dioceses schools annexed to each church." This was confirmed by the second council, which further urged that not only the religious, but the literary, education of the Catholic youth should be conducted by the clergy. The third council, affirming what had been said by the prior ones, adds that "each parochial church should have, in the space of two years from the promulgation of the present decree, its own school where it does not already exist, and keep it up perpetually, unless for serious reasons the bishop considers that a delay may be accorded." And further, it adds that a priest who neglects to obey this rule deserves to be sent away from his parish. To these decrees of the councils, Brandi adds a digest of the allocutions and letters of Pius IX. and Leo XIII. confirming this rigid view of the question, concluding with an extract from the encyclical Sapientia Christiana, and one from the letter of the past year to the archbishop and bishops of New York. Father Brandi says:

"Here the holy father declares that his decision, like that of the whole episcopacy, 'denies the possibility of approving the neutral schools—i. e., those without religion—and asserts the necessity of confessional schools in which the youth shall be instructed in religion by those whom the bishops shall have judged fit for that office.' After the last solemn declaration of the holy father in favor of the parochial schools and the decrees of the councils of Baltimore, illustrated by the documents to which he refers and which we have desired to quote at length, we believe that, according to the expressed desire of the pontiff himself, all controversy on this subject ought to cease."

It is the belief of most disinterested observers that Father Brandi is correct, and those who live in Rome, and are daily witnesses of the struggle going on between the church and its opponents, declare that there is no compromise possible and no "liberalizing" of the Roman Catholic church in the way that so many non-Catholics and lukewarm Catholics are desirous of seeing it liberalized. The very foundation of the organization is the principle of authority of the holy see, and Father Brandi sees, as the pope sees, that any weakening of this authority is simply the beginning of a schism. Private judgment no longer exists on any matter on which the church has spoken, and it must be remembered that it is not merely the opinion of the person who holds the papacy in hand, but the deliberations of the highest authorities of the church, as expressed in its conclaves and councils, of which he is the mouthpiece. We who maintain as the vital element of human progress the absolute liberty of human intelligence and the inherent wisdom of doubt, consider as a theological fiction the authority of the papacy and the dogmas of the church, under whatever form; but, if the church is to stand, it must stand by authority, and every member who doubts and claims liberty of judgment is an illogical Catholic and an enemy to the church, and it is far better for the church, the heads of that body believe, that he should be excised from it than that he should air his liberalism in it; that the church should be diminished in numbers rather than weakened by want of cohesion and homogeneity. This is the feeling of the great body of the churchmen who live near the head of the church, and it is the logical conclusion of Roman Catholic doctrine. We shall not believe, till we see it very plainly, that the Catholic church will willingly relax its grasp on the schooling of the young, or modify the conservatism of its policy in any respect. Meanwhile we extend to those few churchmen and journals who desire it to do so, a measure of esteem.

The Latest Sunday-Opening Decision.

On the 31st ult. there was given at Chicago a judicial decision on closing the World's Fair Sundays which is, says a report, "unparalleled in the history of Cook county." Judges Dunne and Brentano were called to sit as assistants to the presiding judge, Goggin. The suit was over Clingman's injunction. Judges Dunne and Brentano decided for Sunday closing. But Judge Goggin decided for opening, and to keep the majority decision from going into effect, declared the case continued sixty days. The strangeness of the case is, partly, what the reports style Judge Goggin's arrogance in forcing his opinion over that of two colleagues; and partly his manner, which if we may believe these reports was extraordinary.

One account says that "the decision was given in a wildly incoherent and stammering way, and was enforced by a threatening shake of the fist." Judge Goggin denounced the attempts of attorneys to try to compel a court to decide cases dealing with the needs of the present day from formulas in vogue hundreds of years ago. He said he had a profound respect for Lord Coleridge, chief justice of England; for Melville W. Fuller, chief justice of the United States; for Judge Stein, and others; but Jackson park could not be turned over to private corporations to deprive the people of their rights of entering it and enjoying the beauties thereof at any time. Admitting that he was going outside the limits of the evidence, Judge Goggin declared that he was glad he could do so. The report concludes with declarations by the counsel for the Sunday closers that Judge Goggin was drunk.

On the other hand, Judge Goggin says that the reports that he was intoxicated are infamously false. He says that he had not drunk any intoxicating liquor at all that day. The reason that he continued the case, he declares, is that one of the judges, when making up the decision; agreed with him that the Fair should be kept open, but changed his opinion without notice to him, Judge Goggin, when in court. This change of opinion, Judge Goggin alleges, was due to the political influence of a German newspaper. To keep to the original decision, and thwart improper motives, Judge Goggin was compelled to make his arbitrary ruling.

As the matter stands, the Clingman injunction, to reverse which this suit was brought, remains in force, and the Fair will be open every Sunday. By the time the sixty days' postponement has expired, the Exposition will be over.

Everything Christian Trying to Shirk Taxes.

A while ago the Colorado senate held a lively debate over tax-exemption of the property of the Young Men's Christian Association. An account of it sent us got mislaid, but now on coming across it we deem it worthy of the perusal of our readers, for it illustrates the shameless and all-devouring character of the pious element, not content with robbing us of the taxes of its churches alone; and it contains a good point or two against that policy. Senator Drake, who, says our account, "has no great love for a church or anything approaching to it," was the one to spy out the proposed law snugly encoined in one section of a long bill concerning said Association. The section provided that lots with buildings thereon, which are used solely and exclusively for the purposes of the Association in carrying on their religious, educational, and charitable purposes, shall be exempt from taxation. He moved to strike it out. Senator Merritt opposed the motion on the ground that the Young Men's Christian Association does just as much good as the churches, and should be equally free from taxation. Senator Pease launched a shaft against exempting either Young Men's Christian Associations or church property from taxation. He said such laws were founded on sentiment, not on practical common sense. If the buildings should be torn down by a mob the city would have to recompense them. Why, then, should they not pay their rightful share of the taxes? Senator Drake said: "We are taxed to death in this state now. The rate is creeping up grievously every year. People are complaining more and more every year, and well they may when they see hundreds of thousands of dollars locked up in untaxed church property on the free list." Senator Webber placed himself on record against exempting church or any other property from taxation. Senator Pease said that though he should vote to strike out the section, he knew how such things went, and in order to do the best he could for the people he would amend to exempt all Association property to the value of $8,000. He hoped sentiment would not go further than that. Senator Lockwood thought it was a practical question of whether the state would pay to prevent crime or later pay to support criminals in our penitentiaries. We Freethinkers who know that the most religious countries and the most religious ages have ever been the most immoral ones, will not be able to suppress a smile here. Senator Pease's amendment to limit to $8,000 was lost. Senator B. L. Smith moved to amend by including the property of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, the Woman's Christian Association, the Printers' Home, and the Young Men's Institute, as they were all working on the same plan, and if one were exempted all should be. It was objected to on a point of order. Senator Pease moved to limit the property exempt to $25,000. It was lost. The same fate met amendments for $30,000, $40,000 and the original question, and the property of the Young Men's Christian Association will probably not aid the revenues of the state in the future.

Disgraceful it is that there should exist a public sentiment so biased and unjust as to make such a scheme as the above possible. According to the principle on which the above demand is based, it is sufficient for any society merely to put on a thin dress of Christian character and its property however costly or profitable is exempt.

It is often wondered at that Christian organizations are numerous and wealthy, while those of us Freethinkers are few and poor. Ours are stolen from, is one of the reasons.

True Christians Will Torture Themselves.

At Tiflis, Persia, recently the Shiite festival of the martyrs Hassan and Hussein was celebrated in such a revolting manner that the authorities threaten to forbid its future observance. The celebrants slashed and wounded themselves and one another in so frightful a manner that several of them now lie in a precarious condition. Similarly, the devotees of the Christian religion a few centuries ago used to abuse their bodies in a manner equally revolting. They used to cut and flog themselves, kneel on rough surfaces, wear crowns of thorns, and so on. Some among them practiced, also, methods of self-affliction that were not so violent but were of lifelong continuance, such as abstinence from society, fasting, immurement in cells, and the like. These latter penances are still current. The first-mentioned more violent ones are rarely attempted. The law would prevent them as it threatens to do those in Persia. It would be the spirit of humanity, which has risen above the spirit of religion, that would direct the law against them. The acts, however, would be deeds of devotedness to God, and so we should behold Christians setting devotion to God on a lower plane than devotion to man. These Christians, so called, in such courses would do little credit to their enthusiasm in the faith. If that faith is true, these self-tortures should surely be permitted. The principle which their perpetrators wish to observe is that of contempt of earth and of all earthly sufferings or joys, because of the sinfulness of the earth and its adverseness to God. And this has been held, from the earliest age of the church, one of the essential doctrines of the Christian religion. It is based on biblical texts of abundant number and plainness. "He that hateth not his own life cannot be my disciple." "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed?" "Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink, nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on." "Bodily exercise profiteth but little." "Blessed are they that mourn." "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself and take up his cross daily." "Be afflicted, and mourn and weep; let your laughter be turned to mourning and your joy to heaviness." "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, his wife and children, his brothers and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." "Woe unto you that laugh."

When Christianity, the Religion of Sorrow, permeates thoroughly the minds and hearts of men, they renounce earthly joys, and the extreme ones among them even inflict self-tortures. The fact that they do not now do so to any considerable extent, but would even prevent by law such attempts to do it as we read of above in Persia, shows that Christianity has to a considerable degree been subordinated to regard for humanity.

Religion Always Produces Persecution.

On account of the Christian missionary, Miss Melton, having been beaten by Mohammedans in the province of Mosul, Turkey, the vizier of that district is investigating with a view to punishment, and will in the future protect missionaries by passport or guard. Similarly, when Christianity was devoutly believed by the inhabitants of Europe, the adherents of other faiths were continually maltreated among the Christians, unless protected by a guard or something of the kind. Their not being abused now is owing solely to the fact that Europeans do not now believe Christianity with their whole heart. Civilization chanced to start first in Europe, and humanize the people there out of persecuting dissenters. Had it started first in Asia, the people there would now be humanized out of their corresponding persecution.

The news arrives, too, of persecutions of extreme cruelty being enacted by the Turks upon the Christians who have from olden time populated one of the provinces over which the former have control. These are the Armenians. One of these oppressed people writes:

"The American public in general is not, perhaps, aware of the fact that it is an ordinary thing in Armenia to have churches attacked during service, the young women violated, the men wounded or slain, the sacred edifice ransacked, and the altar desecrated with filth and dirt. It is a matter of daily occurrence to have funeral processions mobbed, the mourners dispersed, and the dead taken out of the coffin and thrown to the dogs in the streets; that wedding festivities are stopped by means of revolvers and the bride dishonored. Do the Americans know that to-day the young Armenian wife and the blushing maiden are entirely at the mercy of unbridled Moslems—that horses and cattle, crops and merchandise, furniture, and even houses are coolly appropriated by cruel, ferocious Kurds and Circassians, with the tacit sanction of corrupt Turkish officials?"

Religion always has perpetrated, and always does and will perpetrate, heinous barbarities whenever it is believed without reservation and made a subject of daily thought and feeling. These barbarities can be abolished only by withdrawing the attention of the people from religion and allowing it to sink into ignorance and nothingness.

The Church and State Union Every Seventh Day.

The clergy of California are continuing their war upon the proposed opening of the Midwinter Fair at San Francisco on Sundays. However, they are meeting at the hands of the sensible journals of the state an opposition that we are glad to see, and that will do much toward opening the people's eyes as to what the nature of the infamous clerical policy really is. The Oakland Times, for instance, says:

"Rev. Joseph E. Scott, chairman of the meeting, was candid enough to admit that the movement to close the gates of the Fair on Sunday was indorsed by only a small minority of the community. He thought that at least four-fifths of the people of San Francisco, outside of the regular church-goers, will want the Fair open on Sunday. If this is true, it may, in all propriety, be asked why the Fair should be closed on that day."

Another remark of the same paper, equally good, is:

"The Sabbatarians are very bigoted in their ignorance of what the people want and what is good for the people. Their narrow view comprises only the outlook of a very narrow creed, and the effort to compel their neighbors to believe and act with them is little short of tyranny—it is certainly a presumption that will be vigorously resented by every liberal-minded citizen in the community."

The Times goes on to say that one thing is evident, and that is, that it is unfair to close these institutions, which are supported by the people, on the only day when the majority can view them, so that the working classes are largely deprived of deriving any benefit from that which they are taxed to support and which they desire open. Assuredly these people have just as much right to attend the museum as others have to attend church; and the one class has no more right to close the museums and deprive the others of their freedom of action than the other classes have to close the churches and so deprive many of their privileges.

How far are the people from comprehending the principles of equal rights when they view with complacent eye, without a suspicion of wrong, the spectacle of one profession closing the establishments of all rival industries or attractions on the day when it transacts its trade and reaps its profits. How far from actual accomplishment is the separation of church and state that is supposed to exist in America, when the state unites with the church in suppressing either industry, or recreative pleasure and improvement, on the day selected by ecclesiastics for their own purposes.

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

Freethinkers, Attention.

The headquarters of the Freethought Federation until October 1st will be 17 South Curtis street, Chicago. Please send all communications for Samuel P. Putnam, president, or John R. Charlesworth, secretary, to this place. All Liberal visitors are cordially welcome. Call if possible between 9 and 12 in the morning. Liberal papers and publications will be for sale at this office and also at Henschel's Academy, 517 W. Madison street, during September and until after Congress. Liberal meetings every Sunday evening during September, and International Congress from October 1st to October 8th, at Henschel's Academy.

Everyone going to Chicago this fall should have a copy of S. P. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" in his pocket. He will find it a great aid to intelligent sight-seeing. Price, 25 cents; 5 copies for $1.

Rev. Charles Edwards has been obliged to resign his charge at Freeport, N. Y., because of having been discovered to be the author of an anonymous book recently published and circulated there. In it he expresses disbelief in some such notions as a material hell, the miracles, and so on. He says: "Did I believe in the existence of a material hell I never would have written the following satire. Neither do I believe that any aquatic animal swimming in a geographic sea ever swallowed Jonah. The grotesque picture painted by divines of the big fish's contortions as he swallows Jonah is so horrible that we involuntarily recoil and almost disbelieve our senses. That ecclesiastical teaching which pleases and terrifies the ignorant is certainly in keeping with the dilatory past, but should have no place in the aggressive future. That which distorts and deforms, rendering wild and extravagant a beautiful symbol, demands more than a single protest." The Freeportites are as determined as were their great-grandfathers that the whale shall swallow Jonah as of yore, and determined personally to swallow anything that the biggest-speaking miracle-monger shall tell them; and when it comes to us we hope that Oblivion will swallow them up and hold them for about twenty years until the news to reach us from their antiquated village shall be more sensible.

In a San Antonio Express we find some deserved invective against several preachers who are trying to settle their Sunday yoke more firmly on people's necks. We are glad to have the ecclesiastical tyrants combated on every hand. Joyous is the sound of the strokes falling upon them. The Express introduces its subject thus: "Two or three preachers who are industriously hacking around in the Lord's vineyard with their little hoes while they should be industriously chopping cotton, are laboring with all their puny strength to create sentiment among the Christian people against the Express, because it presumed to say that each community should be left free to enact its own Sunday laws, instead of being compelled to submit to the dictates of voters five hundred miles distant." The truth is, the preachers do not believe in a community being left free to enact its Sunday or any other laws. They would enact all its laws themselves; they would govern all its concerns down to the most minute; they did this when they had the power, as for instance in Scotland and New England; and as to the distance at which the laws shall be made, half of the clergy counsel our sending across the wide ocean to Rome for them. The clergy have no notion of self-government, individual government, or any government but the most despotic by their own sacerdotal selves, in favor of themselves, to make the money flow into their own pockets.

We desire to call the attention of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benefits of subscribing to the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. The yearly subscription is only $3, and subscribers to the Library receive a paper-bound copy of each book issued in it; or, if they desire the books in cloth binding, subscribers can remit the difference in price between paper and cloth binding, and get the books in the latter shape. So far this year subscribers to the Library have received "Paine Vindicated," by Colonel Ingersoll, price 15 cents; the "Creation of God," by Dr. Hartmann, price 50 cents; the "Resurrection of Jesus," by Don Allen, price 40 cents; "Crimes of Preachers," price 25 cents; the "Handbook of Freethought," by W. S. Bell, price 50 cents; "Religion a Curse," by S. P. Putnam, price 25 cents; "Design Argument Fallacies," price 15 cents; "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," price 25 cents, and "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" price 50 cents. Other books besides are in preparation. One of these, we may mention, is "Pleasure and Progress," by A. M. Lorentz, LL.B., of which further notice will shortly be made. Send $3 and receive at once the books already published, and, as they appear, those which will be published between now and January, '94.

The Revivalist.

A STORY OF KATIE.

I remember very well the day when I first saw Katie. There were six of us, juniors at Pierson, who had formed an eating club and had consigned ourselves to the mercies of Mrs. Ames. I trust these were tender for the sake of an exception.

This matron was a widow, as she must needs have been since she had married, with a tearful eye and an apron. When she wiped the one with the other, expostulation supinely yielded to resignation. We had filed into her stuffy front parlor, whose atmosphere was a memorial to the defunct masculin adjunct of her matrimonial entity, and were there awaiting our initial dinner with an anticipation which we felt could not be better than realization, yet which proved blissful in comparison.

"My niece from the country will serve you," announced our landlady. "Katie, fetch up the victuals for the boarders."

The folding-doors were flung apart, and we entered the scene of many future discomfitures.

On this day, however, we did not scan the board—a term, by the way, just plane enough—with chagrin. One and all of us were startled and gratified by the trim little figure that courtesied a welcome, and flushed to the roots of her fluffy light hair. Our contentment was supreme when Mrs. Ames left us to study this pleasing vision, on the impossible mission of looking after the dinner—as if anyone, having once seen it, would look after it!

Katie was truly a comely and dainty maid. Her eyes were large and blue and appealing in their expression. Her red lips quivered and disclosed small, milky teeth. She looked at us as if to say, "Don't you see how embarrassed I am?" and we, not being clowns, did see, and turned our attention to old Bowen's account of Professor Jackson's lecture. Now, old Bowen was nothing if not prosy, and he was quite a leader in our college world, so the self-denial was genuine. Doubtless the drone of his talk served to make it effectual, for gradually the girl became composed. Then little Dobbs ventured a joke regarding the plum pudding, which, he said, reminded him of the Acropolis, "It was such an embodiment of ancient Greece," and she giggled and dropped a plate and then looked frightened. When old Bowen announced that he would tell Mrs. Ames to charge the blame and the breakage to our account Katie was recognized as a member of our organization, and thenceforward accepted the communion with frankness.

There was nothing mawkish or meretricious in this relation. Little Dobbs, indeed, had a liquorish eye and an engaging manner, and one morning we found him awaiting us, to our astonishment, with one very red cheek and a whistle of indifference. As Katie was abrupt in her responses and almost fierce in the way in which she served the cakes, making veritable flipjacks of them, the rest of us concluded that little Dobbs had met that complete reverse which sometimes comes to audacious advance. Thereafter he was respectful, a temporary loss of identity on his part, and Katie, having nothing to fear, became a partisan in our unequal struggle with a Spartan fare, interpolating sly ironical grimaces to her aunt's encomiums, and whispering "care" toward dishes unusually noxious.

Old Bowen used to philosophize about Katie in our walks to and fro. "That child," he would say in his ancient way—he was twenty-one, and had lived—"is a bait for misfortune. She has such capacities for enjoyment that she surely must suffer. She is filled with sensibilities; some day they will rend her like devils. If she were only married to a rough farmer, compelled to toil from twilight to twilight, and to get growls for her pains, with a family increasing each year, she would likely be sufficiently wretched to be contented."

One Sunday afternoon we met Katie walking with an awkward, stalwart young man with red hair, whom little Dobbs immediately styled "William Rufus." She didn't feel proud of her swain, a fact which he appreciated as well as we; and when at supper we attempted some trivialities regarding his carriage and boots, she tossed her head and pursed her lips and said "he wouldn't say boo to a goose."

Poor William Rufus, he had yet to learn that the tongue is a weapon and the heart a hindrance. Mrs. Ames intoned a lament to old Bowen regarding her niece. "She is that captious with her follower," she said. "A sober young fellow, much too good for her that one of these days he'll bid her good riddance, and then she'll see."

Perhaps William Rufus did thus pluck courage from despair, for as the autumn deepened into winter we noticed a change in Katie. She grew listless and absent. Wherever her thoughts were, they certainly were not with us, and yet our conversation had lost none of its sparkle. As little Dobbs said, "A joke needed a life-preserver, her indifference threw so much cold water on it." The ideality that had lightened our meals disappeared, and in its stead remained the heavy, sodden reality.

One evening old Bowen, little Dobbs, and I chanced to pass a Methodist meeting-house that had long since been abandoned. Its windows glimmered, and through them came the sound of exhortation, of psalmody, and of ferment. In front were large posters setting forth in fiery letters that the Rev. Jacob Pross, the world feared, world-renowned evangelist, would hold forth that night on the approaching end of the earth. Admission, 25 cents. Come one, come all.

"Let us go in," I suggested.

Old Bowen demurred. Why should we waste our money in encouraging such imposture?

"Money's no object at such a ticklish time," said little Dobbs, and, moved by a common curiosity, we entered and obtained seats on the middle aisle. The scene was impressiv, even to mocking eyes. The lights were so arranged as to throw the pulpit into strong relief. In front and on the sides was gloom. Within, a tall, stalwart man of swarthy mien and dominant brows, whose face was ugly and fascinating from its very ugliness, was craftily using every elocutionary device to produce effect. His voice, sweet and full and modulated to his thought, swept the entire gamut of emotion from ecstasy to despair, and from determination unto welcome. Its tones pierced like daggers, or soothed like a mother's hand. The man was master of his audience, and exercised his sway ruthlessly. At his bidding tears and hallelujahs burst forth. At his bidding the hardened grew ashamed and the innocent bold. Men confessed sins of enormity; young girls revealed celestial visions. His text was an obscure prophecy from the book of Daniel; but it served as a reason for a ranting and disjected discourse, abounding in imagery and apostrophe.

The preacher announced that he alone was the gate to salvation; that all those who had died, that all those who were alive and followed him not, were doomed to everlasting torment. Coming to the edge of the platform, he leaned far over, with extended arms.

"My parents," he moaned, and tears dripped from his cheeks; "my honest, industrious, God-fearing parents, where are they? Down, down, down! Deep in the eternal gulf of perdition, where the worm never dieth and the fire is not quenched, they expiate their rejection of the truth! And if such be their fate, what will be yours, and yours, and yours whose sins are as scarlet, if you heed not the voice of the shepherd who can cleanse you as white as wool?"

Ay, it was a rapt, a painful scene; for fear and agony and transport are darts that can penetrate even the shield of skepticism. Little Dobbs, whose one purpose was fun, glanced uneasily toward the door. Old Bowen darkened like a Puritan magistrate. "That fellow deserves to be scourged," he muttered. As for myself, I was exceedingly uncomfortable. A crowd always repels me; the fervor of this crowd well-nigh vanquished my self-control. I think I should have incontinently adopted little Dobbs's evident desire had not my eyes caught a familiar face. There, in the very front row, seated among the chosen sisters who were called the "Cherubim Band" was Katie, swaying forward and back, waving her hands and proclaiming glory! Now she would dash from her seat and embrace some one, an indiscriminate anyone it seemed—she, our modest Katie! Now she would pace the steps of a stately dance, and then, down on her knees, with arms upraised! Evidently her companions regarded her as their chief; evidently the Rev. Mr. Pross cherished her as a beloved disciple, for they imitated her impulse, and he, by his glance, encouraged, nay, forced it unto extravagance!

"Look!" I whispered to my friends, and from the humiliation of our little maid there came to us a common aversion.

"Come," warned old Bowen. "It's none of our concern," and we stepped out into the aisle.

At this instant it chanced there was a lull, a thing of dread to the preacher, and he seized the opportunity for its avoidance.

"Stay, young man, stay!" he shouted, dramatically. "You are on the very brink. Pause, oh, pause! If you pass that threshold you fall into the bottomless pit!"

Old Bowen shrugged his shoulders disdainfully; and I, shamefaced, hastened my steps, but little Dobbs stopped and turned around and bowed politely.

"Awfully sorry," he said, "but really, we must go. So if you have any message for your respectable though unfortunate parents, we shall be most happy to deliver it."

There was a roar of exasperation, and the forward swell of a tumult. I caught sight of Katie's face in the throng; it was livid and distorted, and her eyes flashed like a panther's.

"Hurry, you fool!" cried old Bowen. "Do you want to be torn into pieces?"

"Let us have peace rather than pieces," replied little Dobbs. And we turned tail and ran.

It was the next morning at breakfast that this same little Dobbs, who could never let well enough alone, or anything else that he could pick at, precipitated a crisis by saying: "Well, Katie, we can't fare any worse when we get there, that's one comfort."

The girl dropped the tray from her grasp.

"Oh, you wicked young man," she cried, "to dare to scoff at the Lord's anointed! I will never wait on you again—never, never, never!" and she slammed out of the room. We heard the sound of contending voices, but no one came. At dinner Mrs. Ames presided like the skeleton at an Egyptian feast, though there was no other similarity. In response to old Bowen's cautious inquiries she vouchsafed "tantrums" as a cause, and "I'll serve myself" as an effect. That settled it; without our little maid our food turned to ashes in our mouths, and it didn't have far to turn. Through the embassage of old Bowen, to whom disagreeables were always allotted as a privilege, we declined further risks, and shook the "dust" from out our pockets in full payment, and from off our feet in joyous escape. It made no difference to Mrs. Ames. The widowed landlady at Pierson is never utterly forsaken. She lives by faith alone—and so, too, do her hapless boarders.

Some months after our exodus little Dobbs and I, while sitting on the fence one afternoon, caught an approaching glitter of teeth. It was William Rufus, presenting the broadest case of grin I have ever seen. He slapped us mightily on the back and then coalesced the small bones of our hands.

"Congratulate me, gentlemen!" he roared, "I've up and done it."

We glanced from posy to necktie with enlightenment.

"What! Married!" we cried.

"Yes, Katie, you know, and I—and we—are so happy," and the great fellow blushed like a dusty road at sunset.

"Sit down, William Rufus," said little Dobbs affably, after we had expressed the usual disguised condolences. "Tell me, who officiated at the 'wish-you-much-joy?' The Lord's anointed, hey?"

"Pross, d'ye mean? Sure, sir, he's not fit to mate two cats! The Lord's anointed? I guess the devil's got something to say about that! Belike you haven't heard how his great revival ended?"

"No, tell us," we both replied.

"He skipped the burg between two days. You see, it was this way: He and the sisters were having a love feast, where they sings and prays and gets themselves generally excited, when a little dried-up old woman broke up the meeting quicker'n Gabriel's horn. Gad, I guess his reverence wished the end of the world had come afore she got her fingers in his hair! Ho! ho!" And William Rufus laughed seemingly some distance below his boots. "She was his wife from England," he continued. "And she had reinforcements behind her in the shape of four children, but they weren't needed. The services were adjourned in a jiffy, and there wassen't no doxology neither."

"And Katie?" asked little Dobbs with normal impertinence.

"Clean disgusted! She ain't sung a psalm tune since. Why, if it hadn't been for that matrimonial exposure I wouldn't be here to-day, gentlemen, really I wouldn't. She was that set up with his ideas and notions. You see, when he talked so beautiful and confident like of the visions of glory, she believed they were spread out before her very eyes. Well, that deserted wife brought her back to earth again with a bang, and she finds it a pretty good place, too. So when I asked her once more just for luck, she flushed and courtesied and said, 'Whenever you will.' And if you gentlemen would look in on our little home, we'd take it kindly, very kindly, indeed."

"You have a sweet and tender little wife," I said, after we had both accepted his honest invitation. "I am glad she has found such a strong and faithful protector."

"Protector!" he repeated. "I should rather say so. Do you see these hands?"—they were very evident as he extended them. "Well, sir, if any man should dare to even think wrong of my dear wife, I'd squeeze his life out between them."

Ah, stout, viril hands, the day is coming when such a strain will be put upon thy sinews, and well will they fulfill the promise. Alas for love and happiness since such strength as thine can still find its task!

We did call on the young couple and old Bowen went with us. Katie was her old self—that simple, joyous old self that had changed Mrs. Ames's drastic regimen into ambrosia.

"She's just the same," said little Dobbs enthusiastically.

"Yes," responded old Bowen. "That's just where the future troubles lie. Had she taken my farmer, with his yearly accompaniments, she would have been different and more fortunate."

We laughed his gloomy prognostications to scorn, and Katie being settled and beyond our life, we thought but little of her for many months.

It was one day during the following winter that little Dobbs called my attention to an advertisement board with the careless expression, "The devil has broken loose again." There was more aptness in his flippancy than he intended. Yes, there were the familiar red letters setting forth that the evangelist, the prophet, the Lord's anointed, the Rev. Jacob Pross, had returned with a message of woe; that the end was near, and that only through him could there be an escape.

"But he made the same prediction a year ago," I objected.

"What of it?" said little Dobbs. "The earth is a sort of star, I suppose; and all stars have an inherent right to several 'last appearances.'"

It was a week later, when I was strolling alone one evening across the green, that I came across them—I mean, of course, Pross and Katie. They emerged from an obscure path and met me face to face under an electric light. The girl's face was uplifted, the girl's eyes were fixed on that strong, hateful countenance with the same expression of exaltation which they had borne when I had watched her during the revival meeting.

"Katie!" I cried, involuntarily, as I stopped short. She turned and scanned me disdainfully. She shrugged her shoulders and pressed her companion's arm. They passed on unheeding. After all, what concern or right was it of mine? Should I suspect, when her husband believed? But, alas for the simple faith of William Rufus! I more than suspected, I knew.

Commencement Day came and old Bowen, little Dobbs, and I bid farewell to Pierson. We lingered like lovers in our departure, and the town was well-nigh deserted the night when we went to the railway station. We were in ample time for our train, for old Bowen had that anxiety about traveling so common in the aged. We paced disconsolately up and down the platform alongside of the tracks. The weather was stormy, and the lights on the building sent long glimmers through the mist like the pointing of a ghost's finger. From the distance there came the shriek and rumble of an approaching train, and old Bowen began to fuss about tickets and checks.

"Keep your clothes on, old woman," said little Dobbs, soothingly; "we have half an hour yet. That's the 'peanut train.'"

Now, this humiliating term was given to the narrow-gaged communication between Pierson and a neighboring manufacturing town, and little Dobbs was quite right in his conjecture, for a moment later a tiny engine, with a single car, puffed up and stopped. There were but few passengers, and of these the latest to descend were a man and woman.

"Spoons!" muttered little Dobbs, as we noticed their affectionate clinging.

They passed slowly toward the door. One of those spirit fingers touched the woman's face. It was Katie! Little need for us to surmise as to her companion, nor, indeed, did we have time. There was a heavy rush, an infuriated roar, and out from the gloom sprang William Rufus full at the preacher's throat!

Then followed a literal crunch of bones. The body, limp and lifeless, was tossed at our feet like a rag doll twisted by a ruthless child, and William Rufus dashed back and disappeared within the mist, to wander like Cain over the face of the earth.

We might have stayed him, but we raised not a hand; indeed, little Dobbs cried "Good!" and flapped his arms against his side. But old Bowen turned solemnly toward the dead and I toward the living. But Katie wildly waved us away. She clung to the poor body as love alone will cling, despite dishonor and death, and when the men came to bear it away she passed from our view with her arms still tenderly entwined.

Announcing Mr. S. P. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," the Milwaukee Freidenker says: "It is well written and contains many practical suggestions highly beneficial to the visitor at the great Chicago Exposition. Besides an excellent description of the Fair, it gives the reader an accurate account of necessary expenses, hotel and transportation rates, etc. And inasmuch as it contains good reading it recommends itself as a lecture for those who intend to go to the Fair and as a book of reference for those who have been there and wish to refresh their memories."

A terrible misfortune has befallen mankind. The church of Holy Anna at Kankakee, Ill., has burnt down, and the fire destroyed a "part of the earthly remains of Holy Anna." Well, we suppose the church will be rebuilt, and as people die every day we need not despair. Earthly remains just as good as Holy Anna's can be had for the mere asking. The Hindu Organ, published at Jaffna, Ceylon, is on our table. Unfortunately half of the paper is published in the Sanscrit language, which we are not versed in. However, we contrived to pick out an item informing us that even in that far-away island the Christians are fighting with one another. We are glad they are. It may be a means of informing the Hindoos that the invariable outcome of "the religion of love" is fighting.

France under the second empire was distinctly Catholic; now, under the republic, it is secular if not Freethinking in its tendencies. During the empire in 1865 there were 53,350 free schools, with 2,601,619 pupils, while at present there are 79,000 schools with 5,500,000 pupils. During the empire the public-school budget was 10,000,000 francs (1 franc = $0.19), at present it is 125,000,000 francs. During the last Panama scandal the Catholic papers complained that there was no school left "unto God." It is too bad. All the Panama boodlers got their education in the schools of the empire, which were devoted "unto God."

The rapid growth of Freethought in countries like Spain and Belgium, and the never-failing genuine enthusiasm of Freethinkers in these countries, is due to a great extent, we believe, to the intermingling of politics. The Freethinkers form the greater part of the Liberal, the republican party, a party whose aims are extremely popular. It is the politics that makes Freethought popular. Here in the United States Freethinkers form as yet no political party. They adhere to the old ones. Some do so because it is business or fashion, others because their fathers did, and again others through ignorance or, what is worse, political orthodoxy. The writer has seen well-educated Freethinkers, Liberal on all subjects but politics, stand up in a political meeting and make speeches with as much fervor and noise as a Methodist sky-pilot at a revival meeting. And these men not alone threw their own vote, but exhorted others to vote as they did, for parties whose whole political career has been marked by laws detrimental to liberty. Let us take a lesson from our European brethren. Let us form a political party. Let us, till we are strong enough to stand alone, be politicians—i. e., let us vote for any man who will in his public office favor our demands.

The annual Congress held at Herstal on May 21st and 22d by the Belgian Freethought Federation was a decided success. Delegates representing sixty-eight societies were present. The Federation consists of one hundred and thirty-four societies, with an aggregate membership of over seventeen thousand active and paying members. Mr. Mévisse delivered a lengthy but extremely interesting report regarding the operations and social-economic standing of women in Belgium. For the benefit of such of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER as are interested in woman's rights we will when time permits give a translation of this report. At the closure of the report the following resolution was adopted by acclamation: "The Belgium Freethinkers reunited in congress at Herstal, believing that woman is a human being of the same intrinsic import as man, demand the recognition of her absolute right to develop all her faculties and all her aptitudes, and furthermore the revocation of her disfranchisement in the economic, legal, political, and social worlds." It was furthermore decided to print five thousand copies of Mr. Mévisse's report and distribute the same among the societies for general circulation. "The Political Aspect of Freethought" was the next subject for discussion. The following resolution pertaining to this subject was then adopted unanimously: "Congress declares hereby that the Freethinkers of Belgium demand universal suffrage pure and simple (one man or woman, one vote), and accordingly call for the abolition of privileges as awarded certain individuals under Paragraph 47." The Federation's relation to the Committee on Moral Laws was taken up next. And at the conclusion of the discussion it was resolved to continue the support of the Committee, and all Freethinkers were advised to join the Committee or at least make themselves thoroughly acquainted with its work, "Essay on Secular Education." Among the members present at this Congress who have achieved more than a local reputation for their work in Freethought, we will mention Messrs. Oscar Beek, Eug. Renaudière Dons, Joseph Thirion Gorrison, R. Rens, and Van Petenghem, besides our friend Leon Furnemont.

News and Notes.

John E. Remsburg, from his wide and busy lecturing field, dropped in upon us Tuesday, August 28th, and on Wednesday we found our devious way to the World's Fair. Taking the horse-car via Randolph street to State, we meandered along that brilliant thoroughfare, which in itself presents attractions as various almost as the exhibits of the World's Fair. Remsburg takes in the post-office and his multitudinous mail, and then we journey to the foot of Jackson street with a vast throng of other pedestrians, some wending their way to the "cattle-trains," and others, over the vast arch of the bridge, roll and tumble into that modern leviathan of the deep, the "Whale-back," whose hull is of the shape of Jonah's famous sea-vehicle—the whale. It holds over five thousand passengers, goes at the rate of eighteen miles an hour, and is the biggest and fastest excursion boat anywhere in the world. We find our way to the very topmost bough or boat of this huge vessel, and as it floats slowly and grandly out from the dock, a magnificent panorama unfolds—the broad, blue, sparkling lake and the enormous, wonderful city, with heaps of smoke over it, glittering to silver as the volumes surge away into the distance. Soon the mighty vessel reaches its open pathway, and with vast clouds, through which the sun burns like a golden orb, speeds for the White City. Over the luminous horizon we see the golden turrets and domes of the Manufacturers' Building, which at first appears like a huge bank of clouds. Then the distinct outlines of the many structures ray forth—the dome of the Illinois Building with its lofty flag, the Government Building and Administration Building, the massive columns of the Peristyle, the glowing figures and the golden statue of Diana—a prospect of forms and colors that is indeed indescribable; while the beautiful waters are covered with craft of every sort, and the heaving floods seem as immeasurable as the ocean. Landing on the wharf we are crushed in an immense crowd while seeking entrance, but soon we find ourselves in the magic city, and we join in the procession in any direction that our fancy prompts. The Great Basin outspreads first of all with its animating scenes—the gondolas flitting about, the fountains shining, the superb statue fronting the ever-changing wonder and beauty of the huge circle. Into the Manufacturers' Building we pass, and of course it is no use to attempt a description of what we see here, for miles and miles of everything conceivable is before the wandering step. As this is the Butchers' and Grocers' Day, and E. A. Stevens is one of the executive officers of the latter's association, and H. C. Liddell, our Liberal friend, is president, we thought perhaps if we wended to the Sapolio exhibit we might find our comrades hovering about; but they were busy elsewhere, for we discovered them not. The Sapolio exhibit is one of the most interesting in the building, for there is the very little cockle-boat in which Captain Andrews crossed the Atlantic; and Captain Andrews is there to tell us about his oceanic adventures, and certainly the old ship Argos did not go upon a more romantic voyage. The waves of the sea are in miniature before us, and Sapolio shines in golden letters for every day of the week, Sundays and all.

From the Manufacturers' Building we went to Uncle Sam's Building, and glanced at its numerous displays, especially the soldiers and the Arctic sceneries and the big guns, and then we passed to where the picture of Thomas Paine was shining on the wall and there took off our hats to the illustrious Freethinker, and that was the only picture before which we did this act of homage, for in this picture there is for us the glory of the future as well as the memory of the past. Over the Wooded Island, with its gorgeous summer array, we take our path to the Woman's Building, for of course it wouldn't do, as this was the first visit of Remsburg to the Fair, that he should not look upon the Fairest of all, and so for an hour or so we did honor to that sex which theology declares has no soul and therefore will wear no crown in heaven. Well, it behooves woman to do the best she can on earth and let the New Jerusalem go by the board. We came in contact with our Secular friends, Mr. and Mrs. Freeman, Mrs. Foster, Mrs. Roberts, and several other ladies. I do not know whether women can keep a hotel or not, but we found it exceedingly difficult to get a lunch in the Woman's Building, more so than in any other locality. In the first place they only allow four at a table. That's a new kink, and just like a woman. We four and no more, although there might be half a dozen in the party and all could sit at the same table! Then again, when you go in you get a check. This check is taken from you at the table, and when you get your lunch you receive another check, and this allows an exit, and without this check you can't "exit." We waited half an hour for a lunch of tea and sandwiches—it was fifteen minutes before we could give the order, but we couldn't go out, no matter in how much hurry we might be, for we must have lunch anyway in order to get our check. We were really imprisoned and had to stay. That also must be a woman's idea. I don't think I shall go to that restaurant again, for really there is too much compulsion about it. I wonder if that is the way women will run politics.

We spent the afternoon in the Midway Plaisance. This is always crowded, and the grandest part of the exhibits, which it costs nothing to see, are neglected, while the ten-cent shows flourish. But after all we go with the tide. It tires one to look too long at the beauties of art, at the wonders of human genius, and it is quite restful to go into this merry midway and take a look at sights that don't strain the intellect. When you want to sit down all you have to do is to pay ten cents or twenty-five cents and look upon the most outlandish dance, hear the most curious music, have your fortune told, etc. Certainly the philosopher can find a great deal to enjoy in this conglomeration of the world. The great Ferris wheel is now in full operation, and it is an experience not to be omitted to roll around that vast circuit and take a bird's-eye view of the Exposition. The big wheel takes it slow and easy, and almost before one knows it he is lifted two hundred and sixty-four feet into air.

We ramble through the streets of Cairo and have our pictures taken in Oriental costume and feel that we are really Turks and Arabs in that nondescript scene. Remsburg with his twisted mustache and flowing beard makes an imperial-looking sheik, and Charlesworth has the air of a desert Bedouin. Temples and dancing-halls attract the little mules and the camels, which are slow-coaches indeed. This street is crowded all the time and everybody seems to be happy with the variety of sights. The Moorish palace, the Chinese theater, the Turkish café, the glass works, also add to the vivacity of our travels.

Toward sunset we wander along the state buildings—Colorado, Washington, Kansas. This is Missouri's day and its building is ornamented with a thousand colored lights and the bands play and the people throng the esplanade. The Pennsylvania and New York buildings are also ablaze with electric jets. The Intramural railroad gives us a bewildering journey from Iowa's Building to the Administration Building. We wind in and out amidst the flashing sceneries, and the vast darkness is like an illumined palace. The search-lights are out and penetrate the night for fifty miles away with their pyramids of flame. Multitudes are about the Administration Building; and the whole vast square, the fountains and waters, the statues and the white walls, are radiant with the incandescent splendor. Our last look is at the Electrical Building, and this certainly in a concentrated manner gives one the glories of man's genius.

So we passed the day, crowded as no other day ever was crowded, I guess, with the signs of human progress. Our pioneer work, so often remote and laborious, and with apparently small results, finds here its most beautiful and manifold promise. I am glad that Remsburg happened round and that we could change off for a while, and, instead of the picket-line, see the rush and glory of actual triumph, and have the world give us its warmest, brightest, sweetest side, instead of the cold shoulder which it so often does.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

International Congress of Freethinkers.

Since the publication of the outline of our official program the committee, as a result of further labor in extending and enlarging the same, has received several additions to the program and further adhesions to the Congress. In consequence thereof we have been compelled to enlarge the same, making an imposing array of talent to be brought together upon this occasion, of which the like has never before been witnessed upon the continent of America. Delegates' credentials and certificates are arriving from Europe, thereby assuring all friends of our cause of the cosmopolitan character of this Congress. The friends of freedom from miles distant, across oceans and seas and continents, are sending in their respective adhesions to our Congress. When such an interest as this is manifested in the great and approaching event by our brethren in far-off Eastern lands, how much should our own members be interested herein in proportion to them? From Spain, yea, Catholic Spain, come the most encouraging reports, a truly significant fact, of the zest, the zeal, the enthusiasm and earnestness with which the gallant little band of Freethinkers, though striving against popular prejudices and overwhelming odds, adhere firmly to their principles and work together, sustaining each other in the heroic fight they are making for the sacred cause of human liberty. A compendium of these will be found immediately following the amended program given here.

Friday, October 6th.

Delegates will assemble at the hall at 10 A. M., and proceed from there to the World's Fair in a body.

Saturday, October 7th.

Delegates will meet by appointment, and will be shown the various places of interest in and around the city of Chicago. Grand banquet commencing at 7:30 P. M.

Sunday, October 8th.

There will be sessions during the day, at which addresses will be delivered upon various Freethought topics by all the lecturers in turn.

This Congress has now reached such proportions that it will of a surety eclipse anything of its kind. Our friends will observe that on Sunday afternoon, October 1st, the session will be given to our German brethren; on Tuesday evening the Bohemian Freethinkers will be present, and the evening given to them. Wednesday is "Woman's Day," and on Thursday evening the Polish and Russian friends of our cause will also celebrate with us. Thirty-three speakers are now upon our program. The speeches will be interspersed with fine music and singing. John J. I. Remsburg, a son of our gifted co-worker, will officiate at the pianoforte, and will render selections of his own composition.

The following credentials and adhesions have been received from Spain:

TO THE G. O. OF THE G. A. OF THE U. L. Y. F.:

I have the honor of now naming as our representative in your body, with full powers to act as such, for us,

Adolfo de Maglia y Galbis, distinguished for his numerous self-sacrificing acts and deeds in the interests of Progress and the welfare of humanity. And in the event of his inability, from any cause whatever, to act personally for us, then and in such event to appear by proxy. Receive, gentlemen, one and all, the profound acknowledgments of our fraternal regards. Signed, Jan. 27, 1893.

JOSE MONTERO, Principal and Director.

A. L. G. D. G. A. D. U.:

We, Ven. and Wor. Offs. and other Wor. of the R. L. La Razon, No. 142, under the auspices of the Gr. Or. of Spain, Greeting.

To the Com. Organization of the Universal Congress of Freethinkers of Chicago:

Greeting. S. F. U.

At a general session of this Lodge, on the 18th inst., the following order, verbatim et literata, appears on the records of the same:

"Bro. Rosendo Costellos proposed that the Lodge send a representative in its name and by its authority to attend the Congress of Freethinkers to take place in Chicago. Which motion was put and carried unanimously; and thereupon, Bro. Adolfo de Maglia y Galbis was, upon motion, duly delegated, and empowered to be represented by proxy should any unforeseen cause prevent his personal attendance at Chicago.

"It was further resolved, that a transcript of the minutes on this matter be forwarded, should it be deemed necessary or advisable."

And in order that his rights as such delegate may be fully established and recognized in such Congress, we issue this certificate, on our Lodge paper, using the Lodge Seals for the purpose at Madrid, Spain, this 19th day of January, 1893. VINCENTE POLO, Sec. G. T. S.

Greeting. S. F. U.

To the Committee on Organization of the Universal Congress of Freethinkers, Chicago:

At a general session of this Lodge, held on the 15th inst., it was unanimously resolved to deputize as its representative at your Congress and conferred on him all necessary power to appoint proxy in his place, stead, and name, if, for any cause, he should be unable to reach your city or attend thereat;

Adolfo de Maglia y Galbis,

And, that he may be properly credentialed to you, for himself or proxy, we have used our Lodge paper, and attest same with the seal of our Lodge, in Valencia, Spain, this 30th day of March, 1893.

JOSE CAUDO, Victor Hugo, Gr. S.

HOMER CAUDO, Ven. Mast.

To the Committee on Organization of the Universal Congress of Freethinkers, of Chicago,

Gentlemen: As the head of this Valentian lay school, I have the honor of naming an indefatigable worker in the cause of human progress, as our representative in your body. He will bear to you our unwavering fealty for your Congress.

Adolfo de Maglia y Galbis,

Receive, gentlemen of the Congress, our heartfelt wishes for your success. C. CLEUTOSIO, Mireable.

Freethinkers, with these letters of congratulation coming as they do from such a distance, exhibiting a great interest in our proceedings, I would say to you, manifest your own enthusiasm, try to be present upon this auspicious occasion. Come and bring your friends. Let the city of Chicago be crowded with Freethinkers in October next. The eyes of the people may then be opened as to our real strength, and the cause be benefited throughout all nations. Two things I would urge upon all—send a subscription and be sure to attend the Congress.

The Eastern Dances.

An allusion to the Chicago Fair and the "naughty Midway Plaisance" in your valuable TRUTH SEEKER of August 19th—being given me by Mr. Weeks—induces me to send you the following for your next.

The subject of the dance, mixed up and distorted by the general press sufficiently to extract some "truth," has just come up from Chicago and the proscribed spot specially. I was sorry to see the Oriental dance on exhibition, but considered the best policy would be not to advertise it by condemning it.

I had satirized not it, but the class of audience it attracted in India, Algiers, and Egypt in many journals.

In a pamphlet entitled, "Irish Stew—Made in Algiers and Geneva," I gave a couple of pages stating undeniable facts about "la danse du ventre."

First, it is not especially Mohammedan.

The Mohammedan men and women don't dance. "La Belle Fatima" is an assumed name for the queen of dancing-girls all over the East, and they are considered disreputable.

I speak of the populace of the East, for la danse du ventre is never witnessed by the great chiefs except once in a while when they have Europeans or Americans to entertain. Then the dancing-girls are paid for the performance given in private palaces, and no grossness nor indecency is witnessed, no girl falls on the platform exhausted. In India and Algiers and Egypt the girls are moderately clothed (so were all the girls I saw at the Chicago Fair); but if the theatrical managers at the Plaisance saw fit to strip arms, bosoms, and legs of his girls he was quite within his right, and only following la mode of the highest aristocratic society under England's imperial rule. Both in Egypt and India and at Queen Victoria's court it is law—bare neck and arms—and under republican American permission I have seen the same charming exposé of natural beauties. Wicked Paris covers them with lace. I write now of private people of high-class standing, not poor dancing-girls, paid so much an hour.

Morality is a relativ term. Marriage with one wife is moral with the Western. He has, by social law, as many illegal ones as he can pay. Only, unlike the wives of the East, he does not feed and clothe them. They are under our civilization outcasts, prostitutes, recognized by no church nor society.

Those do not exist at all over the East.

In Thibet the women marry several husbands, and sneer at the monotonous homes we enjoy with one man. So on, I could write fifty pages of comparisons. I will, if you give me space in your admirable paper. I will give you illustrations of Algerian life that will please your readers, and tell you of the happy condition of the women there under Mohammedan rule, both socially and financially superior to our boasted Western civilization.

If the supersensitiv visitors to the "Midway Plaisance" could only know what a boom they are giving the new Mohammedan movement in New York, they would prefer to take a little Chinese opium and sleep than wake up the sense of justice stirring in the hearts of those who have personally known the woman's real life in the real Oriental harems, and her comparatively divinely protected one as a public dancer or prostitute to gross Europeans or Americans.

I joy in the proprietor of the Persian Theater, who will not allow his exhibit to be shut up, nor his girls cast upon the gross, immoral, and drunken city of Chicago. There is no Christ to save these now, on earth, and the church raised in his name damns them to hell, here and hereafter.

Yours for woman's rights to equality with men,

New York, N. Y.

SARAH PARKER.

Random Notes.

It seems by the old story that Sampson kept his strength until he told the truth, then God punished him by reducing him to an ordinary man and allowing the Philistines to exercise the function of burning out his eyes. Perhaps he had better have stuck to the lie as David did.

If your enemy smite you on one cheek and you turn the other you have disgraced your manhood, and the dignity of your descendants will be proportionately disgraced. The man who teaches you such a religion would be foremost in the crowd who would kick you for being an ass.

Letters of Friends.

On With a Liberal University.

WEST SUPERIOR, WIS., Aug. 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I here send you clippings from newspapers showing you what kind of Catholic priests we have in this part of the country.

I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER a party had proposed a Liberal University, and to call it the Ingersoll University. I think that it is a very good proposition, and I am willing to donate money to that enterprise, and also to send one of my boys to that school.

Those parties who are so fortunate as to possess Liberal training, pecuniary means, and energy should push the matter at once. Respectfully, NORSE VIKING.

Going to the Congress.

MCCUNE, KAN., Aug. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed $7. Three dollars is for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1894 in advance, the good old paper that I have read for over twenty years, and the Truth Seeker Library, as advertised. I will need the "Pen Pictures," by Putnam, as I am going to Chicago to attend the Liberal Congress. The day it opens, October 1st, I will be seventy years old. And for the other $4, send me two of Wettstein's small gold badge-pins. I see them advertised at $2 each. I would like to have them soon, so my wife and I will have them to wear to the Freethought Congress. Please let us know the number of building where it will be held, so we will have no bother in finding the place.

Yours for eternal justice,
M. S. GOWIN.

On to the Congress.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Aug. 27, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I was pleased to read in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 26th that the arrangement for the coming Freethought convention in Chicago, with the program for the exercises of each session, was so well perfected. It seems to me there cannot be a more fitting time for such a convention, for so many can come and attend the meeting and the World's Fair at the same time.

I like the name "Freethought," and it ought to commend itself to all shades of Freethinkers, and not be confined to any one school of thought. I hope it will arouse to renewed action many of the Liberals all over the country that are in a state of inaction and indifference. For this is a time for revolution as well as evolution of ideas. Therefore, I hope the meeting will be a success. And certainly some of the leading workers in the movement deserve all the encouragement they can get. They have a fine array of talent of lady speakers as well as gentleman. Let the East and the West and the North and the South come together for the purpose of agitating Freethought principles all over the land, and let us shout liberty, liberty, and freedom for all.

PROF. A. B. SEVERANCE.

The Character of Christ.

OSCEOLA, IA., Aug. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed fifty cents for two copies of "Religion a Curse," etc.

J. E. Remsburg delivered two lectures here in this town on the 24th and 25th. On the evening of the 25th he lectured on "The False Claims of the Church," and a good per cent of the hearers were Christians, and among them one preacher, Cross. At the close privilege was given to anyone who wished to ask questions, and the Rev. Mr. Cross got up, heated to a white heat, claiming that the lecturer had said hard things about Jesus Christ, and that Christ's good name had been assailed, and that it was his (Cross's) duty to defend that spotless name. He said that he and the good people of Osceola wanted something in the way of proof, and that Remsburg should point out at least one immoral saying or deed against Christ. And the Christians cheered long and loud; and when he got through Mr. Remsburg commenced to reply by saying that for the historical Christ he had all respect; that the Christ he was speaking of was the theological Jesus Christ, and for that man, if he ever did have an existence, he had not the least bit of respect, and then proceeded to point out what he was challenged to do. And just then I noticed that the hall had commenced to leak Christians just as a sieve would water. But the reverend stood the fire until the crowd was dismissed. Then he came forward and gave his hand to J. E. Remsburg and the surrounding friends, stating that he loved the truth, and if he was in error he wished to know it, and that he would examine Remsburg's evidence; and if he does we will nail THE TRUTH SEEKER to the cross, not to crucify, but to glorify.

Yours for eternal Liberty and Truth,
R. JONES.

We Suspect Irony Here.

LESLIE, MICH., Aug. 15, 1893.

DEAR PROFESSOR ESTERBROOK: I have just read in the papers with a sad and heavy heart that you and others that conducted the trial at Eaton Rapids against our dear, beloved pastor, C. M. Arthur, have found him guilty of lying and misrepresentation, and that you won't give him a permit to preach any more. I have been praying every day to our blessed Jesus that you would change your minds and reinstate him as one of God's servants. No man in Michigan has ever been lied about and persecuted as he has been. He was tormented, harassed, and lied about at Nashville by the scientists and Infidels of that town until he had to leave, and just because he stood up boldly and denounced sin wherever he found it. Then he came here to Leslie, and was soon moved by the Holy Spirit to tell the G. A. R. what he thought of them. He said that the G. A. R. and W. R. C. were the two worst societies outside of hell, and that is true and no lie. And Mrs. Bingo, bless her heart, says they are drawing off all our members and she don't see how they can go to their meetings and spend all their money instead of using it to support the gospel and pay the preacher, and I don't either. Of course he broke up the Congregational church here, but for heaven's sake let him preach. He is doing good and his friends all like him. Then think, professor, how hard and cruel it would be to throw him out of employment, out of his chosen profession. He has never been used to work, and it might make a bad man of him. That story about him having two wives I don't believe, and neither does Mrs. Bingo, and no one can say he has gone contrary to the sacred scriptures. Think of Solomon and King David, and think of yourself placed in the same circumstances. Then, for the love of Jesus, restore him, and God will bless you, is my prayer.

MRS. PENELOPE PETTIBONE.

Humane Sentiments.

CHADRON, NEB., June 17, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Our meeting and resolutions have been kept out of the Associated Press reports. If you can spare the space, will you kindly notice our meeting and resolutions, to show that there is some humane sentiment here? Yours truly,

MARY SMITH HAYWARD.

THE PROTEST MEETING.

Handbills scattered over town Monday announced a meeting to be held that night at the Congregational church for the purpose of protesting against the cowboy race to Chicago. In response the church was filled. Mrs. Mary Hayward was chairman and Rev. John Power secretary. Speeches were made by Professor Ferguson, Rev. John Power, Mrs. Jennie Sheldon, Mrs. Hayward, A. G. Fisher, Fred Houghton, Judge Ricker, and others. There was considerable divergence of opinion as to the best way of getting an expression of sentiment. Finally a committee consisting of Mrs. McFadon, F. L. Ferguson, J. S. Romine, and A. E. Sheldon was appointed to draft resolutions. Each member of the committee prepared resolutions, and after a prolonged debate lasting until after 11 o'clock, the following were adopted as the sense of the meeting:

Resolved, That we, citizens of Chadron, Neb., assembled in mass meeting this Monday evening, June 12, 1893, express our sentiment of opposition to the cruel treatment of animals under all circumstances, and our hearty appreciation of the widespread desire to prevent the infliction of cruelty upon the horses to be used in the cowboy race which starts from this city for Chicago to-morrow afternoon.

Resolved, That we are in perfect accord with the officers of the Humane Society in the endeavor to prevent the infliction of cruelty upon the horses and will readily cooperate in punishing the offenders.

Realizing that we are powerless to prevent the race, we affirm, that because our city has been chosen as a favorable starting-point, there is no reason why any elsewhere should judge that this region is the home of the brutal, lawless, and desperado class.

Fallen in Love with a Book.

CORRY, PA., Aug. 20, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: About three years since I read an article in the Newcastle Chronicle, a fearless and one of the most popular journals in England, referring to the value and importance to heterodox thinkers of a work entitled, "The Martyrdom of Man," by Winwood Reade, a nephew, I believe, of the great novelist. The terms in which the correspondent spoke of the work inspired me with a strong desire to procure a copy, and in a little time the treasure—for such I esteem it—was in my possession. It came from the Truth Seeker office, and for it I paid $1.75. And when I examined the contents, the quality of the print, paper, and binding, I concluded that it was the cheapest piece of literature I had ever bought, and I am a bookworm. The excellence of the matter surpassed my expectations. The author, who died young, in the firm conviction of the principles which he fearlessly presented, must have been an accomplished scholar and a gentleman in the highest sense of the term. His object was to present truth, which deeply impresses the mind of the reader. In the entire work there is not to be found a single line of sarcasm. The author expresses himself in serious, religious earnestness, and the reader lays down the volume with a calm, satisfied, yet strongly established conviction of the truths evolved by the highly gifted, fearless writer. Among my books the "Martyrdom of Man" is my favorite. I have it so placed that I can put my hand on it if only to read a few pages, and it has been well perused, but never fails to interest me. I noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, some time since, that the price was reduced to $1. At that low price, if the value of the work was known, the "Martyrdom of Man" should command a large sale among the intellectual lovers of Freethought.

I am an entire stranger to you, and my only desire is that I may be instrumental in introducing the rich feast of reason which I have myself enjoyed to all lovers of truth.

OWEN JONES.

"In God We Trust."

WATERTOWN, PA., Aug. 24, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I should like to have a little talk with H. J. Avery, Newark, N. J., about his "To Grover Cleveland, president of the United States," printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 19th, and concerning in particular "In God We Trust." Now, I do not believe Grover Cleveland or any president of the United States had anything to do with that. James Pollock, who was born and is buried at Milton, Pa., just four miles from where I am writing this, suggested "In God We Trust" for the national currency after he was appointed director of the Philadelphia mint by President Lincoln in 1861.

James Pollock held "fat" offices, from president of the Northumberland county courts to that of Congressman and governor of his native state in 1855. He was a Presbyterian, and much inclined to office. Had Mr. Avery been born and raised up this way he would not blame the author of "In God We Trust," for the no-hell and all-hell Presbyterians, the Lutheran hypocrisy, the water-splashing Baptists, and the come-to-Jesus Methodists rule the roost up here.

Still, since the late Mr. Pollock was a graduate and in later years president of the board of trustees of the College of New Jersey at Princeton it may be that the New Jerseyites are guilty of neglect in turning him from the legend "In God We Trust."

I read in a newspaper an item some years ago—but cannot recall names or dates—which went on to prove that some good old farmer from a Southern state suggested the idea to Mr. Pollock originally, but as Mr. Pollock had more fame and religion than the old farmer, the legend will go down to history wrongfully credited.

Again, Mr. Avery would not attempt to harm a dead man who in life was too modest to refuse a "fat" office every time it was offered to him. "In God We Trust" would not be much of a campaign argument in some localities, but it does the business in this community.

However, the next time I go to the Milton cemetery (unless I am boxed up C. O. D.), I shall see to it that "In God We Trust" has been carved on the ex-governor's headstone. It is of just as much use there as on the dollar, and since seven-sevenths of the people of the United States by their actions prove that the almighty dollar is the ruler of the universe probably the late respected Mr. Pollock was not so much in error after all in his selection of the legend. A man has just as many gods as he has "In God We Trusts" in his pocket. J. WARD DIEHL.

Land Offered the Ingersoll University.

OAKLAND, NEB., Aug. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find fifty cents for "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" and "Religion a Curse, Religion a Disease, Religion a Lie." I want one of Mr. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," but I cannot spare the money now.

I get more and more interested in reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. I used to read some bosh of a different character and thought it was all right because I was brought up that way from childhood and I used to be a good boy. But now, when I cannot swallow the old stuff any more, and worse yet, I cannot keep quiet but say what I think, I am the worst creature that nature produced in this orthodox community.

V. Marcia Goff's proposition of building an Ingersoll University is to my notion a very good plan and ought to be taken hold of with energy and carried out.

I am a poor man and have to work to support my family, but I have a farm of one hundred acres in southwestern Minnesota, three miles from a very prospering little town of twelve or thirteen hundred people, and I will give ten acres of ground to build such an institution on, free of incumbrance. The land is worth $30 per acre.

Let us hear more about the Ingersoll University.

A Christian Who Likes The Truth Seeker.

SAN PEDRO, CAL., Aug. 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Regarding THE TRUTH SEEKER, several copies have been presented to me by Mr. Duffie, of this city. I consider the paper a valuable one and have been much interested while perusing it during my leisure time. For twenty years I have been a shifting member of the orthodox churches. Regarding Sunday as the Sabbath, I no longer recognize that day as a day of worship and rest. I fail to find between the two lids of the Bible that God commanded Sunday to be kept as a day of rest and worship. God never commanded the people to keep that day as the Sabbath. Christ nor the Apostles never recognized Sunday as the Sabbath but kept the seventh day—the Sabbath of the Lord thy God. Why, I find that I have been following a delusion and that Saturday is the Sabbath. Sunday is only a day of heathen origin. According to the Bible the Seventh Day Adventists are right in keeping Saturday as the Sabbath. They prove their day and the orthodox churches can not prove their day as the Sabbath. By whom was the Sabbath changed, my good readers? Why, by Constantine. Now the orthodox people bow down to the Catholic church. For one I am glad to seek for the truth and to obtain knowledge. Generally speaking, the orthodox people seem to be horrified when they see THE TRUTH SEEKER read. Perhaps if they would be a little more Liberal and throw aside prejudice and read up both sides they would become more enlightened. I would advise no one to read THE TRUTH SEEKER if they thought it would ruin them or make them backsliders. Concerning myself, I am aware I can read the paper without interfering with my religious belief; hence it is my privilege to read both sides of this great question. I want all the light possible and to know the truth and the facts and break loose from delusions. I believe in God. He says we are made after his own image. I want to gain a home in this eternal world and be with him. This earth is only a preparatory place for the next existence. Let every person be guided by God and his word and not man's.

Death of a Man Who Will Ever Liv in Memory of His Good Acts.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Aug. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It is my sad duty to state the sorrowful news to the many readers of your much-esteemed journal of the death of our valued friend and brother, Thomas Goddard, who subscribed for the grand old TRUTH SEEKER a short time after its first issue, nineteen years ago, at Parris, Ill. Our worthy brother had been a constant subscriber and reader ever since. Our Liberal friend was born at Holmesbury, near Huddersfield, Yorkshire, England, Dec. 26, 1826; died at Du Quoin, Ill., Aug. 7, 1893, aged sixty-six years eight months. For nineteen years I have closely associated with Brother Goddard, and a more true, moral, and genial man I have never known during my life of over sixty years. I have learned through intercourse with my departed friend that he has had the good fortune to have never been contaminated much by religion. He was a pronounced Materialist, had the true moral courage of his convictions, and never swerved to right or left in the face of an opponent. He had such control of his passions that he seldom offended his friends and neighbors who differed with his views on religious matters, but invariably when expressing their opinions in regard to him said he was a good man. In regard to his loyal principles to Liberalism, the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER cannot help remembering his many donations made for the purpose to help in the battle against the blighting influences of the teachings of Christianity, or any other doctrine the tendency of which impeded the progress of universal mental liberty for man, woman, and child. Brothers Hacker, Cook, Casey, Harmon, Aunt Elmina, and a host of other Liberals will remember his generous little gifts; also will many in this vicinity now cherish more than ever in their memory the gift of some Liberal book he has given them in the past few years. In conclusion, I will say Brother Goddard was a lover of the beautiful and true in art and nature. The aphorism of the immortal Thomas Paine may well be applied to our deceased friend, with a slight change in phraseology, viz., "The world was his country, to do good his highest conception of duty to his fellow-beings." The world is made better by such characters as his having lived in it. So far as we know, he died an unbeliever in religious superstition—showed no signs of being haunted by fear of the consequences of death. His wish in regard to his funeral was carried out, which was simply to have no clergyman to speak over his remains, only some suitable selections read by some friend. Consequently, by request of his son and other Liberals, I selected Form I, page 65, of "Truth Seeker Collection," which I read at the house. At the grave I read Form II, page 71. A large concourse of people attended his funeral. Among them were several of the clergy of the different churches of this city. His good, kind, humane acts will ever hold a sacred place in our memory.

Rhyme on Religion.

JACKSONVILLE, ILL., Aug. 19, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I hope the following little effusion will merit a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

BILLY PATTERSON.

Preachers feel their oats, to their gall you must submit tamely,
And if you don't go to church it's hell—
viz. and to-wit, namely:
They will tell you enough about God to fill a mule's ear full,
About Helen Blazes and other inventions not at all cheerful,
About apostles and patriarchs and other non compos mentises
With Y. M. C. A. and Sunday-schools for apprentices.
Will stand up and with a big mouth call off the dance;

While you sit in silence like idiots to learn ignorance
And take in the racket when asked to believe
The little rib story about Adam and Eve,
That a woman has more ribs than a man
And there's babies in hell not the length of a span;
That the sun stood still (just think of the snap Old Sol had waiting for Joshua to finish his scrap).
Galileo could swipe 'em now with a horse-laugh at persecution Saying "the world moves," and every time it turns round it makes a revolution.
"Made in the image and likeness," is what they try to show,
(Now isn't that putting the infinit down pretty low?).
Fancy the ape-man formulating original causation,
Shaping it like himself either slim or fat and chunky
And building it up after the model of Darwin's high monkey.
I like the divinity better we're obliged all to follow,
Which somebody named the Almighty Dollar.
Without money given it to prop up its stays
Christianity at farthest would liv but few days.
That Solomon was better posted than some one less so is what the preacher discloses,
And the next best trump he holds in his hand
Is the Sheeny bushwhacker Moses,
Who ground out commandments to fossilized man
To keep Sunday holy—no other gods in the van,
How not to be caught stealing or killing each other,
Etc.—How could a bastard honor his father and mother?
Yourself or friend you might harm (let me modestly clamor),
But you couldn't hurt the Lord to come at him with a sledge-hammer.
With Sundays and holy days I don't bother a minute,
But take nothing for holy that hasn't holes in it.
Have soured on laws made from recipes in that holy book
Like the Dutch putting onions in most things that they cook.
When the rich get to heaven they will expect the best rations
With all other good things except poor relations,
Will have golden harps and wings plenty to do them,
But let the poor be content with the gospel preached to them.
If the Lord made us what we are with this "wicked world" to imprison us,
Being just why didn't he attend to his business
And not throw on the market cholera microbes and rattlesnakes' fangs,
With flies, fleas, and bed-bugs to come at us in gangs?
Man is said to have dominion over all earthly things,
But the musketo tells him better from the song that he sings.
That Providence helps those who help themselves, is what they say about him,
If that is true and is the best he can do we will try to get along without him.

The Evils of Chinese Immigration.

NUNACH, CAL., Aug. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 29th an extract of Colonel Ingersoll's article concerning the Chinese, which appeared in the North American Review for July. Now, I am a great admirer of Ingersoll, but as I am not a God-worshiper, neither do I believe man infallible, and in this respect Colonel Ingersoll is certainly as much mistaken as Moses was when he wrote the Pentateuch. The colonel is bringing forth the same arguments as used by Senator Hoar, Joseph Cook, and the Presbyterian assembly, which induced President Cleveland to defy the Geary law. The glory of these United States, and that to which it owes its wonderful prosperity and growth, is that a poor man who has some intelligence and energy has a chance of bettering his material condition. Did a poor man down South during slavery times have a chance of bettering his condition? It was hardly a desirable place to live except a man was a landed proprietor and rich enough to own slaves. Now, the system under which the Chinese come to this country is virtually a system of slavery; the Chinese laborers are owned body and soul by the Chinese Six Companies. I came to California twelve years ago a poor boy with nothing but two willing hands. I found all kinds of labor well paid, thanks to those who were instrumental in restricting the traffic in Chinese slave labor. I have done well, and am now on the road to prosperity. What should I have done had I come here and found hundreds of thousands of Chinese blocking every avenue of employment and working at rates with which a white man could never hope to compete? I don't believe I ever would have been able to subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, nor would these lines ever been penned. I believe it is a well-known fact that those countries where labor is the best paid—as, for example, the United States, England, and France—are the most progressive and enlightened countries in the world; while take those countries where labor is the most wretched and ill paid—as for example Russia, Spain, and Italy—there you will find more ignorance and retrogression than anywhere else. Colonel Ingersoll says the Geary law is as inhuman as the ukase of the czar expelling the Jews. Now, I deny it. The Geary law did not intend to drive the Chinese now here out of the country. It simply provided for a system of registration as a protection against any more Chinese entering the country. It is not near as severe a measure as the alien bill recently passed by the French Chamber of Deputies, which provides for a system of registration of all foreigners, with fines and imprisonment for non-compliance. This measure has been passed without any disapproving comments from those who delight in calling the Geary law inhuman, barbarous, and cruel. Out here in California, where people have a much better chance of forming a correct judgment on the Chinese question than Eastern people—who probably never saw a Chinaman in their lives except on a lid of a teabox—there are only two classes of people who are in favor of Chinese—those who own the immense grants of land which California is cursed with, and which can't be profitably worked except by cheap labor, and all the Christian ministers or sky-pilots, who are afraid the Chinese will retaliate against a few dozen missionaries in China. I am sure if Colonel Ingersoll and all the conscientious opposers of the Geary law living in the East could only take a trip through the Chinese quarters in all the large cities on the coast, and view the opium dens, where hundreds of persons white and Chinese are ruining their lives, take a peep into their gambling dens, investigate the infamous traffic in Chinese slave-women, who are bought and sold like cattle, the crime and extreme filthiness all through, no candid or unprejudiced person would ever conclude that the Chinese were a benefit to this or any other civilized country. Colonel Ingersoll fought gallantly during the war on the side of free labor as against slave labor. This Chinese question is essentially the same thing—viz., free labor against Chinese slave labor—and I believe Colonel Ingersoll, when he comes to investigate the question thoroughly, will yet see it in its true light.

Yours truly, H. SANDBERG.

Unusual Theories.

VILLA GROVE, COL., Aug. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I will inclose $3.25 in post-office money-order—$1.50 for Saladin's Book, "Roses and Rue," and twenty-five cents for "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," by Mr. Putnam, as soon as it is printed, and $1.50 to put my name in the Freethought Federation of America, to John R. Charlesworth, secretary. Please send "Roses and Rue" as soon as you can. I did not see his advertisement in the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

I thank you and Heston for the cartoon of myself you send me. Heston in his cartoon to the ex-Catholic put a snake round each leg, a snake round each arm, a big snake round my waist with its head on my shoulder. I believe there were five or six snakes round me for three weeks, trying to take me back to Catholicism and to hell. But I am all right yet.

I think it is very strange all the world's people are against one another in everything, in creeds and politics and in everything else. Gods and the future is the most.

The fall of man is the great mystery. I will tell you my thoughts about the four secrets of the earth. There is no god, only a devil in shape of a snake or serpent, which came out of the first fire we call the sun, which makes the worlds. Our sun made the worlds of our solar system, Neptune first. Atoms make the worlds, one at a time. I can see the atoms all the time. Night and day they are the same color, light brown or yellow, as thin as the thinnest piece of mica. Millions and trillions would go in a cubic foot. When I look at them a minute or two, they seem to know it, and go round lively, making a thick crowd of them only to let me know they are active and living beings. You can see the atoms as well as I can. Then go outdoors, and look first to the blue sky. Look keenly in one place a moment. You can see small white dots between you and the clouds. The darker the clouds the better.

Darwin said man came from a monkey, a monkey from an eel, making an eel our ancestor. Darwin had no great reason when he said man cannot swim when he is young or old. If he does not learn to swim he will swim like a rock, as I did when first I tried to swim. You can try animals, every kind, cats and dogs, before they open their eyes. They can swim across a pond when a week old. You can buy or borrow a poor child in your city a year old, and heave it in a pond, he will swim like a rock. Darwin might have used the same and found his error. A man says in THE TRUTH SEEKER of last week man came from fish. Spiritualism has the same notion. But I tell you man came to earth as man, rude and ignorant—but a man for all that. Atoms are the creators of heaven, earth, and hell. They are the creators of man. We are all atoms. The world is atoms. All space is atoms; no empty space. I cannot see them near me. I can see all the space round me full of white specks.

Now, Mr. Editor, I have something to say about our green world. At present philosophers are making all believe the world is going round the sun once in a year. I do not believe them, for the reason I believe in place of going round the sun the world is rising. It commences to rise the 25th day of June, keeping its own swing every twenty-four hours east to west or west to east, and rising little by little westward or little north; it keeps rising till the 25th day of December like a ship at anchor in harbor, rising with the tide and then lowering down with the tide to where it was. The world could not go round the sun with the north pole tied to its end. Besides, the south pole is tied with frost and ice and clouds, the same way old philosophy is by old creeds and old Christianity, old lies and humbug. Freethinkers will drive old superstition away from the world. Force and matter are immortality. So is the soul of man. Man is the rightful heir to this world, after he drives out old creeds and devils, gods, snakes, and serpents. The center of the sun is the hell and home of all the gods.

Mr. Editor, I bought the book "Force and Matter," and I read it nearly through. Mr. Buchner said we sharpen our glasses and can see in a drop of water a thousand of small living animalcules, and in salt water every kind of living being, with the aid of our glasses. Why don't they try with the aid of their microscope the air between them and the clouds, to see what is there for them—look slow and steady in one place near the blue sky this side of the clouds? Buchner and his crowd think there is no life in space nor any other place only in the face of the earth. There is where they are all astray, and as long as they are astray, they keep the rest of the world astray. Why does not science see and find out what is all round them? All is life and living atoms; the world is all life; space is all life; our solar system is all life. There is no death there; a change, that is all. Man must rise himself, with more reason, more justice to his fellow-man, more freedom to himself and his fellow-man. Drive old creeds and all superstition from the land, all Christianity. The land and the world will be blessed then, not till then.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A Rev.

In a pulpit stood a reverend one,
Preaching of God's love, and that of his son;
Such eloquence was in his words and voice
That each hearer could but exult, rejoice.

"God is our father Jesus our mother,
And as brothers we must love each other.
Oh, how I can feel my own heart swelling
With this love fraternal I am telling."

As he glanced upon all his audience
Magnificently arrayed and immense:
"O hat I could take you each by the hand,
What matters wealth, if we're a loving band?"

"Is not the divine love that would enfold
Humanity, better than wealth of gold?
If all cared less for wealth, and pomp, and fame,
And more for loving deeds in Jesus's name,

"If our bonds and deeds were love fraternal,
Constant, ever abiding, eternal;
Gazing upward toward the heights afar,
Methinks we'd see the heavenly gates ajar."

Regardless of the tone and words he said,
There was oft a rakish wag of the head,
A sensuous stamp on the solemn face,
Cold, soulless the eyes he closed to say grace.

Outside the church he scorned the poor and weak,
And to the gold kings only liked to speak;

They alone were his and Jesus's brothers,
Offscourings, scum, and low trash the others.

Sympathy and love with them he shares not,
For their misfortunes and sorrows cares not,
For their wants and needs has but indifference,
His brotherly love a sham and pretense.

Dorothy's Mustn'ts.

BY ELLA WHEELER WILCOX.

"I'm sick of 'mustn't,'" said Dorothy D,
"Sick of 'mustn't' as I can be."

"From early morn till the close of day,
I hear a 'mustn't' and never a 'may,'
It's 'You mustn't lie there like a sleepyhead,'
And 'You mustn't sit up when it's time for bed.'"

"'You mustn't cry when I comb your curls,'
'You mustn't play with those noisy girls,'
'You mustn't be silent when spoken to,'
'You mustn't chatter as parrots do,'
'You mustn't be pert and you mustn't be proud,'
'You mustn't giggle or laugh aloud,'
'You mustn't rumple your nice clean dress,'
'You mustn't nod in the place of yes,'"

"So all day long the 'mustn'ts' go,
Till I dream at night of an endless row
Of goblin 'mustn'ts' with great big eyes
That stare at me in shocked surprise.

"Oh! I hope I shall live to see the day
When some one will say to me, 'Dear, you may,'
For I'm sick of 'mustn'ts,' said Dorothy D,
"Sick of 'mustn'ts' as I can be."

An Anecdote of Lincoln.

An anecdote showing Lincoln's merciful nature in a touching light, and from authentic sources, is the one of the sleeping sentinel, William Scott, whose life Lincoln saved after he had been condemned to be shot. Lincoln personally saw Scott and talked with him for a long time. Scott would not talk to his comrades of the interview afterward until one night, when he had received a letter from home, he finally opened his heart to a friend in this wise:

"The president was the kindest man I had ever seen. I was scared at first, for I had never before talked with a great man. But Mr. Lincoln was so easy with me, so gentle, that I soon forgot my fright. . . . He stood up, and he says to me: 'My boy, stand up here and look me in the face.' I did as he bade me. 'My boy,' he said, 'you are not going to be shot tomorrow. I am going to trust you and send you back to your regiment. I have come up here from Washington, where I have got a great deal to do, and what I want to know is how you are going to pay my bill.' There was a big lump in my throat; I could scarcely speak. But I crowded it down and managed to say:

"'There is some way to pay you, and I will find it after a little. There is the bounty in the savings' bank. I guess we could borrow some money on a mortgage on the farm.' I was sure the boys would help, so I thought we could make it up if it wasn't more than $500 or $600. But it is a great deal more than $500 or $600,' he said. Then I said I didn't see how, but I was sure I would find some way—it I lived. Then Mr. Lincoln put his hands on my shoulders, and looked into my face as if he were sorry, and said: 'My boy, my bill is a very large one. Your friends cannot pay it, nor your bounty, nor your farm, nor all your comrades. There is only one man in all the world who can pay it, and his name is William Scott.'

"If from this day William Scott does his duty, so that if I were there when he comes to die he can look me in the face, as he does now, and say, I have kept my promise and done my duty as a soldier, then my debt will be paid. Will you make that promise and try to keep it?' I said I would make the promise and I would keep it. He went away out of my sight forever. I know I shall never see him again, but I never will forget his kind words or my promise."

Mr. Chittenden, who had a personal share in bringing the case of Scott to Lincoln's attention, and who watched his subsequent career, says he became "the general favorite of all his comrades, the most popular man in the regiment, and modest, unassuming, and unspoiled by his success." He died risking his life in the rescue of wounded men, "being shot all to pieces."

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

THE BIBLE AND NURSERY RHYMES.

A little four-year-old, in a very religious family who had Bible-reading every morning, was very anxious to join in the exercises, so he was taught the following lines: "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone." When it came his time he repeated this for a few times, but one morning he astonished the circle with the following: "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone, let him alone, and he'll come home dragging his tail behind him." He had evidently got his Bible and nursery rhymes mixed.

AN UNSELFISH CHILD.

Little Millie had been told by her mother that God never slept. One night, after praying God to care for them while they slept, she finished with, "And now, God, do try and get a little rest for yourself."

SIMPLE JUSTICE.

A very bright little ten-year-old was reading in the Bible the story of Jonah. When he had finished it, he threw down the book in disgust and exclaimed: "If I had told such a lie as that I would have got a good whipping."

Correspondence.

DES MOINES, IA., Aug. 11, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As every week I glance over the letters of the Children's Corner I cannot help but feel ashamed of myself for not helping in our contest for liberty of thought and speech.

I have not been to Sunday-school for more than a year because I get so tired—always the same thing over and over again. The Methodists of this place were intending to have a picnic yesterday, but it rained so hard they couldn't go. I don't see why they didn't pray a week or so beforehand, so as to be sure of a good day!

One day, not long since, one of our good "Christian" girls asked me if I was an infidel. I asked her why she wanted to know, and her reply was that she liked to know the views of her schoolmates, but when I came to give her some of mine she soon turned away.

In glancing over a paper before me I find a piece about "Sabbath-Keeping," saying that nothing should be read on Sunday except the Bible. Now, I think that if it is given as a rest-day then a person has just as much right to sit down and read a novel as the "holy book," and I think most of my readers will agree with me.

Hoping to see this in print if it escapes the waste-basket, I remain,
Your Liberal friend,

LAURA HUFFMAN.

[Laura is a brave, sensible girl, whose healthful sentiments will always find a welcome in the Children's Corner.—Ed. C. C.]

ATCHISON, KAN., July 23, 1893.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: My last letter to the Corner was written on a dreary Sunday morning, when the rain was falling in torrents, but this Sunday is a typical Kansas day. The sun has risen in all its majestic glory, and is penetrating the clear ether blue. A cool, refreshing breeze loiters around, and it seems more like a spring day than a day in mid-July. The question, What could be more beautiful than a Kansas landscape at this season? comes before my mind. One can stand on some high eminence and, on looking around, he beholds a scene of most varied beauty. We see the checkered fields of grain stretching out over the hills and rolling prairies, with strips of timbered land between. The lofty river-bluffs, crowned with sylvan beauty, rear their stately heads and overlook the beautiful valleys below. It seems to me that it would be hard to conceive of a more picturesque scene than the "Sunflower State" presents at present. Everything combines to make a scene that old Germany with her beautiful Rhine might envy.

Since last writing I have been enjoying a two weeks' vacation. In company with my sister and a young lady friend, I visited Fort Leavenworth. We had a pleasant time. The fort is probably the most beautiful spot in Kansas, and it has many attractions, such as the beautiful national cemetery, the Grant monument, the military prison, the government building, the various batteries, a beautiful lake, and other things. The Grant monument is an imposing piece of work. It is surmounted by a bronze statue of the great military chieftain, representing him in full military dress at the capture of Fort Donelson. By the way, General Grant died just eight years ago to-day, but his name still lives, not only engraved in bronze and marble, but enshrined in the hearts of a grateful nation.

We also visited the old historic town of Kickapoo, which was named for the Kickapoo Indians, who once had a village there. Kickapoo and vicinity is one of the historic spots of Kansas.

In my last letter I forgot to mention Mr. and Mrs. E. A. Haslett, who are staunch Freethinkers of Atchison. They are readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Free Thought literature. Mr. Haslett is a conductor on the Central Branch railroad.

The last TRUTH SEEKER was an interesting one. Mr. Macdonald's editorials were to the point, and I observe that he had a larger amount of editorial than usual. He is a good writer and a deep thinker. Mr. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" are almost as good as a visit to the Fair. I await with eagerness the new books by Mrs. Matilda Joselyn Gage and Helen H. Gardener; also Putnam's new work.

Well, dinner is ready, so I will bring this letter to an abrupt close, as I am going away this afternoon. Hoping that Miss Wixon and her army of young Free-thinkers are well and happy, I remain as ever your friend,

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subtleties, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition of Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

Col. R. G. Ingersoll's ARGUMENT

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money for education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine of the narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and a drepentable hypo-rite. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence or woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt too, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 80 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFSSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Litigiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abscon; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continence even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

OF

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Gems of Thought.

To enjoy the pleasures, you must know how to leave them.—Voltaire.

PROSPERITY, adversity—these are but names; our happiness is in ourselves alone.—Ibid.

We should not be satisfied with merely approving those who do well, but we should emulate their good deeds.—Socrates.

VIRTUE is profitable for all things, infinitely preferable to riches or birth.—Ibid.

We should be content with our actual condition, without, however, neglecting to improve it if in our power.—Ibid.

No real greatness can long co-exist with deceit. The whole faculties of the man must be exerted in order to noble energies, and he who is not earnestly sincere lives in but half his being, self-mutilated and self-paralyzed.—Coleridge.

KNOWING is seeing, and if it be so, it is madness to persuade ourselves that we do so by another man's eyes, let him use never so many words to tell us that what he asserts is very visible. Until we ourselves see it with our own eyes and perceive it by our own understandings, we are as much in the dark, and as void of knowledge, as before, let us believe any learned author as much as we will.—Locke's Conduct of the Understanding.

THEOLOGICALS calmly assume that the destruction or radical transformation of the old symbols is equivalent to the destruction of the things symbolized, and the alteration of the human nature which created them. For my part, I cannot even understand the doctrine that the conscience (for instance) was created by a belief in hell and will perish when hell ceases to be credible. It seems to me clear that the conscience created the old hell and will presumably create a new one, sufficient for practical purposes, whenever the ancient mythology decays.—Leslie Stephen.

THE peculiarity of the evidence of mathematical truths, is that all the evidence is on one side. There are no objections and no answers to objections. But on every subject in which difference of opinion is possible, the truth depends on a balance to be struck between two sets of conflicting reasons. Even in natural philosophy, there is always some other explanation possible of the same facts; some geocentric theory instead of heliocentric, some phlogiston instead of oxygen; and it has to be shown, and until we know how it is shown, we do not understand the grounds of our opinion.—Mill.

We figure society as a machine, and think that mind is opposed to mind as body is to body; whereby two, or, at most, ten little minds must be stronger than one great mind. Notable absurdity! The plain truth, very plain, we think, is that minds are opposed to minds in quite a different way; and one man, that has a hitherto higher wisdom, a hitherto unknown spiritual truth in him, is stronger, not than ten men that have it not, or than ten thousand, but than all men that have it not; and stands among them with a quite ethical, angelic power, as with a sword out of heaven's own armory, sky-tempered, which no buckler and no tower of brass will finally withstand.—Carlyle.

JACOB had four wives—Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah—and the abundance of his wives, as well as of his children and cattle, is spoken of as proof of the divine favor, just as it would be to-day in Utah. The element of the crime of David, the man of God's own heart, which God rebuked, is not the polygamy, but the manners, in robbing Uriah of his wife, when Uriah, instead of an opulent flock of women, had only "one little ewe lamb." But it is "the Lord God of Israel" who says to David, "I delivered thee out of the hand of Saul, and I gave thee thy master's house and thy master's wives into thy bosom." It is needless to cite a single further text to prove that the God of the Old Testament directly sanctioned polygamy.—V. B. Denslow, LL.D.

THE king ruled by force, the priest by fear, and both by both. The king said to the people: "God made you peasants, and he made me king; he made you to labor, and me to enjoy; he made rags and hovels for you, robes and palaces for me. He made you to obey, and me to command. Such is the justice of God." And the priest said: "God made you ignorant and vile; he made me holy and wise; you are the sheep, I am the shepherd; your fleeces belong to me. If you do not obey me here, God will punish you now and torment you forever in another world. Such is the mercy of God. You must not reason. Reason is a rebel. You must not contradict—contradiction is born of egotism; you must believe. He that has ears to hear let him hear. Heaven is a question of ears."—Ingersoll.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

News of the Week.

AN attempt was made by some person unknown to burn all the churches in Dover, N. H.

A FINE monument to Abraham Lincoln, bearing his statue, has been unveiled in Edinburgh, Scotland.

THE Catholic Congress at Chicago will, it is said, "bring together the most notable gathering of ecclesiastics and laymen ever seen in America."

THE cholera has finally penetrated into England. It has likewise entered America. Cases have appeared in Jersey City, N. J., a port for foreign steamers.

LEO XIII. has made advances to the patriarch at Constantinople and the czar at St. Petersburg, who are the heads of the Greek Catholic church, with the view of reuniting that body to the Roman church.

WHEN the Jews of Yalta, Russia, were ordered to leave, a mob attacked them, prostrating many and dragging them through the streets, and killing several. Meanwhile the Greek Catholic clergy held up their crucifixes to encourage the assailants.

FRANK LEWIS, an ex-agent of Rev. Dr. Parkhurst's society, has been arrested at Cottage City, Mass., on a charge of passing worthless checks. C. H. Gardner, the Parkhurst agent convicted of blackmail, is still in the Tombs prison awaiting another trial.

FOR the present no retaliatory measures will be taken against citizens of the United States residing in China, and every effort will be made to protect them and their interests in peace and safety till the assembling of Congress in regular session, when legislation more favorable to the Chinese is hoped for.

TRADE depression continues. It is not, however, severe. The meetings and processions held to manifest the distress of the unemployed have been small. The one at Chicago was the largest. At this, the police were attacked. An ensuing riot was averted only by getting the military, with artillery, in readiness.

A NUMBER of Mohammedan religious pilgrims on their way to Mecca, who were confined temporarily in the lazaretto at Tripoli, engaged in a riotous demonstration on account of the burning of their clothes by the authorities in the work of disinfection. The military were called out and it was not until they had threatened to fire into the crowd that order was restored.

THE Roman Catholic clergy of Nicaragua, Central America, is not disposed to be friendly toward the provisional government. Its opposition is being aroused by leaders of the conservative party, who hope to gain control by making promises to favor the church in the administration of the government. Fearing their open opposition, Acting President Zelaya has promised the priests that there shall be no interference with church affairs, and this may cause the clergy to be more favorable to him.

At the funeral of Mrs. Paul G. Faber at the German Lutheran church of Decatur, Ill., on the 20th ult., some members of the G. A. R. Women's Relief Corps and Odd Fellows went to the church wearing their badges. The Rev. G. L. Wagner, pastor of the church, peremptorily ordered that all badges must be taken off, or the persons wearing them could not enter the church. Daniel Moore had on G. A. R. and Odd Fellows' badges. Mr. Wagner told him and his companions that it was against the principles of the church to permit the badges in the sanctuary. Moore replied with some heat that he had fought three years for the right to wear the G. A. R. badge and no man could force him to take it off now. Mrs. Melville Hatch, of the Relief Corps, told Mr. Wagner that she would see him cremated before she would take off her badge.

CONTINUING its efforts to obtain a termination of the extradition treaty between Russia and the United States, an address has been issued by the Russian-American National League to all Russians, Finns, Lithuanians, Hebrews, and other former subjects of the czar, to organize and send protests to Washington. "Declare to the political parties," says the appeal, "that not a single vote of a former Russian subject now an American citizen will be cast for the political party which will not make the issue of its platform the abrogation of the shameful treaty with Russia. Demand of your Senators that they may at the next session of Congress insist that notice of termination of the treaty be given, pursuant to the provision therein. This iniquitous and disgraceful partnership with despotism must be dissolved at once; sons of a country born of revolution shall not offer aid to a tyrant."

TRYING TO BRIDGE THE CHASM BETWEEN REVELATION AND EVOLUTION.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1893, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Rensburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Rensburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Rensburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

Woman's Building.	Art Palace.	Fisheries Building.
Administration Building.	Manufactures and Liberal	Agricultural Building.
Electrical Building.	Arts Building.	Transportation Building.
Machinery Hall.	Mines and Mining Building.	Horticultural Building.
	Forestry Building.

A visitor to the Fair says of this book—reading it in THE TRUTH SEEKER—that it is charming and to one who has seen the Fair vastly entertaining.

A New Book by Helen H. Gardener.

FACTS AND FICTIONS OF LIFE.

CONTENTS.

Preface.	Sex in Brain.
The Fictions of Fiction.	Heredity in Its Relations to a Double Standard of
A Day in Court.	Morals.
Thrown in With the City's Dead.	Divorce and the Proposed National Law.
An Irresponsible Educated Class.	Lawsuit or Legacy.
The Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity.	Common Sense in Surgery.
Woman as an Annex.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced a degradation of sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on the Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual" the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pinneries, the English debaucheries, governmental crimes, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage was opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other principal reformers "favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Sunday Opening Entails No Added Work.

The churchmen say that Sunday opening of the museums, libraries, and art galleries would occasion more labor. But it would seem from the experience in England that the opposit would be the case. The experience there is that the people are more orderly in such places than elsewhere, and require less supervision. In England, a picture gallery that has an attendance of two thousand in four hours requires only five willing attendants, whose sole labor is to walk about. The following from Professor Fowler, director of the London National History Museum, is to the point:

"I am glad to say that the majority of the trustees are in favor of opening it on Sunday afternoon, and three-fourths at least of the staff are also in favor of such opening. Many of them are so enthusiastic as to say they are willing to come and take their turn at attending even without remuneration. . . . These men would not be expected to sweep or clean, to stuff birds, to arrange tablets, or write labels, or do any of the real work we expect of them on week-days; they would have to walk to the museum, walk or stand about there for a few hours, and then walk back again. Probably, if they were not doing this they would be taking a walk somewhere else, so that they would not be working any harder than usual. And out of our whole staff only a few need come, so that the turn would only fall on each man perhaps once in every six or eight Sundays; and we should never ask anyone to come if he had any conscientious objections."

Even a correspondent to the Christian World makes the following admission in regard to the London People's Palace, which is open Sundays:

"We looked in one Sunday to see and judge for ourselves. It was 4:30 when we entered the large hall; about fifteen hundred were present, mostly of the better working class and shop-assistant types. All was decorous and orderly. And the greatest attention was being paid to the various items of a thoroughly high-class and miscellaneous sacred concert. The most cantankerous could have found no occasion for fault-finding. . . . The total number of Sunday visitors is estimated at 92,927. In the library was found a large number of seats occupied by studious-looking men and women, while in two smaller rooms a score or two of lads were having a good time with the 'illustrateds' and interesting boys' books. These rooms were in charge of lady volunteers. . . . We looked in vain for a policeman, and on inquiry later found that the audience, although composed of 'East-Enders,' did not need the services of these gentlemen."

The English novelist, Walter Besant, writes:

"There is no more beautiful, no more religious sight in London than that of the two thousand earnest men and women who gather together on the Sunday morning—between church and dinner, if they have gone to church —to hear the organ recital [at the People's Palace]. There is nothing which more vexes the soul of the publican than to think of these men kept away from the drinking-bar by sweet and holy music."

Mr. Besant should have mentioned also the other person whose soul is vexed. This is the clergyman. His soul is vexed at the people's hearing fine music, which delights the soul and elevates the sentiments. He pretends to desire the delighting of people's souls and the elevation of their sentiments, but that he really does not do so is shown by his hindering these things when they take a penny from his pockets.

Mr. Besant adds:

"Yes. There is one sight more beautiful still. It is the sight of the two thousand people who throng the library on the Sunday evening. They are quiet; they enjoy warmth and light; they are in the best of company; they are filling their minds with noble thoughts. Instead of this those who do not blush to sign a document against Sunday opening in the name of what they call religion, would send them out—what to do?—to tramp the streets, to find in crowded bars shelter from cold and rain, to swell the ranks of the fallen, and to subject the young to temptation. In the name of religion! Is it possible!"

It is not only possible that the clergy and those whom they influence would do this, but it is the fact, the infamous, revolting fact, that they have ever done it, and will try to do it to the end of time, for the purpose solely of averting competition with their trade of vending for cash silly myths and lies.

Learn the Nature of a Thing, not Names for It.

On the question, whether we should teach the languages and literature of the extinct nations of Greece and Rome, Christians and Freethinkers lean to opposite sides. Christians, in general, favor these classical studies. Freethinkers usually declare them injudicious; we have two or three times so expressed ourself in these columns.

What we need to learn in this world is the properties of the things that surround us, and crowd against us from all sides, affecting us for good or bad. These things and their properties are so numerous that we need for learning them every bit of time that we can get. As to names for them, we need a name for each, that we may indicate it to our fellows. But we need only one name for each. The English name is enough. To learn several names for a thing would be a waste of time and of brain-room. When we have learned five names for an object we know no more about its properties than we did before. We know no more about how it will affect us, about how we should deal with it. When we have learned the Greek for rheumatism, we have learned nothing about how to cure that disease; but we have consumed time in which we might have learned something about how to cure it. Learning the Latin term for democracy does not teach us whether democracy is good or bad, or how we should extend or limit it, or what measures are favorable to its maintenance; but it does occupy moments in which we could have found out something on these matters from history, or observation, or meditation.

The study of the ancient literature is somewhat more beneficial than that of the ancient languages. This may be read in translations. In it we see about all of the great questions of government, morals, and so on, looked upon differently from today. In reading it, we are in another atmosphere. The effect is broadening to the mind. Yet, the exact value of the thoughts therein is not great. The science is but guesses. The guesses are occasionally right, but they are not verified. As to the literary, the esthetic quality of this literature, it is deemed by many moderns to have been greatly overrated. Many are growing to think of the classics, as Ingersoll does of the old masters in painting, that they are lauded only because they are old. It is likely that extreme antiquity exercises an influence of strange perversion over the judgment in the case of the merit of art-works as it does in the case of the credibility of miracles. But however this may be, it is at all events certain that the thing of the very first importance nowadays is modern science; and everything else, no matter what it may be, must come second, and receive consideration of its claim for time only when the demands of the first have been satisfied.

A youth spent in learning Jewish myth-history in the Sunday-school, and an early manhood spent in learning the way in which two extinct peoples spoke three thousand years ago, too often constitute what passes as an educated man.

How It Sounds in Plain Words.

An organ of the American Protective Association prints an article headed "Instructions to True Catholics." This is, a sub-title states, "The Platform of the Papal Party as Laid Down by the Pope." It gives "Orders from the Holy See." The article is signed with a column of names of the sound dear to the Catholic heart, such as Michael, Patrick, Jerome, Aloysius, and Dennis. It has at first the aspect of a genuine deliverance of the church. But a little inspection shows it to be an imitation. Indeed, a note suffixed explains: "The essence of this document is to be found in the writings of so called American Romish bishops and the letters of the pope to them." Thus, the essence of it is said to be genuine, though the words have not been used by papal authorities. We concur that the essence is genuine. We think that the article correctly represents, without exaggeration, the real sentiments of those authorities. We deem it useful as putting in plain words the feelings and designs of the Catholics, which these persons merely intimate. After giving "To Our Beloved Brethren in the Faith, Greeting," the document says that it is issued "in view of the pressing necessity for active, earnest efforts on the part of all Catholics to save our Roman church from destruction; to preserve the income and privileges which we of the hierarchy have enjoyed for a thousand years; to maintain the pleasure of shoving the masses who have toiled and economized that we might fare sumptuously and wear fine linen; to continue to build fine churches and cathedrals as monuments to perpetuate our own memories; to preserve ignorance in the masses to insure devotion; to enable us to keep our vows of celibacy with the aid of the confessional."

This is not misrepresentation. The objects of the clergy in striving to preserve the church are those here named. They are, for one, "to preserve the income and privileges" of the hierarchy. The object certainly is not to preserve the income and privileges of the populace. This populace has always had less income and privilege in Catholic ages than in non-Catholic, and less in Catholic countries than in non-Catholic ones. Another object imputed is that the clergy may "fare sumptuously and wear fine linen." This is true. They do eat and dress much better than the people whose toil supports them, notwithstanding that they ought to be the first in exemplification of Christ's doctrine of self-denial. Another object of the church dignitaries, says this document, is that the people continue "to build fine churches and cathedrals as monuments to perpetuate" the memories of those dignitaries. Surely the church has never done anything to perpetuate the memories of the masses. In church monuments and annals we nowhere find, as we do in secular, mention of the masses, or of men of talent in their midst, like Stephenson, Fulton, Edison, and Darwin; but we meet only laudation of popes made eminent by their intrigues, or clergy besainted for their insanity in self-torture. Another object for which the clergy continually endeavor is, says this document in plain words, "to preserve ignorance in the masses to insure devotion." Truly, so it is. And finally, a wish of the clergy is said to be, to continue to keep their "vows of celibacy with the aid of the confessional." That they do observe their vows of celibacy in a peculiar manner qualified by the practices of the confession, we all know, and know of course that they wish to keep on doing so.

The orders are issued, says this document, addressing the Catholics, "to remind you of your duty to your faith when you vote as a citizen of this heretical nation." There are quoted the two utterances of Loyola, the father of Jesuitism:

"Let everyone persuade himself that he who lives under obedience, should be moved and directed by his superior, just as if he were a corpse."

"That we may in all things attain the truth; that we not err in anything we ought ever to hold as a fixed principle; that what we see white to be black, if the superior authority of the church define it to be so."

To these is added the following from the encyclical of Pope Gregory XVI. of Aug. 15, 1832:

"If the holy church so requires, let us sacrifice our own opinions, our knowledge, our intelligence, the most sublime attainments of the human understanding."

Finally we are given the "Holy Laws of Romanism." We have not space to comment on each of these separately, but who will say that the following are not what the Catholic ecclesiastics really mean in their cautious and fine-sounding phrases?

"1. The holy father is the supreme ruler of the world, in spiritual as well as in temporal matters, especially where we have the votes or power."

"2. It is the duty of all Catholics to plot and labor for the absolute supremacy of the pope."

"3. It is the duty of all Catholics to take part in elections, to know that 'politics are a part of morals. Politics are morals on the widest scale.' They must also give perfect submission and obedience of will to the church and the sovereign pontiff, as to God himself; they must remember that they are to acknowledge no civil superior before the holy father, that in their political work 'they must always and in the first place serve the interests of Catholicism.'

"4. We are opposed to any system of schools that teaches the youth more than Roman catechism, or that teaches the young to think—it is unnecessary, a waste of time and money, when the holy father has been appointed by God, especially at the Vatican council in 1870, to do the thinking of this world. Therefore we call upon our subjects to do all they can to break down and destroy the free public schools of this Protestant nation, which has compelled us to set up and maintain at great expense parochial schools to defend our faith, thus lessening the incomes of the clergy."

"8. We have learned with regret that there are some Catholics who are possessed with the insane idea that their children can get a better education in the godless public schools than in the parochial schools. These insane apostates must be taught by their father confessors that they cannot disobey the holy church with impunity. In such cases the confessor of such Catholics must deny to them the sacraments and impose a severe penance, order a liberal alms, which the confessor will give as he may deem best."

Plain speech makes a big difference. A thing that passes challenge in elevated phrase and covert intimation, may at once start indignation when presented in words open and direct.

No one can truthfully maintain that the above is not a true representation of the designs of the Catholic church.

A Preacher's Misassertions.

A subscriber asks us to comment a little on a sermon of Rev. Mr. Darwood, D.D. This was preached at St. Paul's Methodist-Episcopal church, Middletown, New York. The title was "The Critic As He Appears Under the Searchlight of Truth." The critic whom Mr. Darwood professes to turn the searchlight upon is the Freethought critic. This personage he slanders venomously. That part of his sermon which is not libel consists of misreasoned efforts to confute the critic's allegations.

The libels are beneath notice. As to the defenses against the critic's animadversions, one is, that "Christianity has made all the scientific men."

We will say something to this. Christianity lays stress upon the assertion that man is helpless, unable to know. Science proceeds on the assumption that man can help himself to better conditions, and is able to know. In fact, knowing, or knowledge, is what science is. Again, Christianity teaches that events do not occur in an unseverable order, so if we know the one is present we may know the other will be, but that their succession is determined by the changing will of a divinity, or the prayer of a believer. It teaches that, given the conditions which we have hitherto observed preceding death, or the conditions preceding a tornado, the death or the tornado may be made not to follow, and often does not follow. Science affirms that given these conditions the events must follow, and do always follow. Christianity teaches that the sun may pause, iron may float, men may walk on waves, withered arms may be restored by a word. An inspection of science will show it to be composed of affirmations that the sun never pauses and cannot do so, iron never floats and cannot do so, men never walk on waves and cannot do so, and withered arms never are restored by a word and cannot be, and so on. Of statements of these and similar laws, we say, science consists wholly; if the laws were subject to continual infraction by supernatural agencies, science would be of no use. Thus the more the domain either of Christianity or of science is enlarged, the more the domain of the other is decreased. The two are mutually contradictory and hostile. In view of this, we may easily reckon of how much use Christianity has been in making scientific men.

Dr. Darwood next declares that the first institutions of learning in this era were endowed by Christians. Of course they were, for there were none but Christians then to endow them. In the present generation, when there are getting to be other people than Christians, other people than Christians are endowing them. That they are doing this abundantly, too, the little work, "Infidels and Charity," shows. But the Christians who endowed institutions of learning did not do so as Christians. Whenever they felt and acted as Christians, they scoffed and spurned learning, as belonging to this evil world and the evil nature of the human being, and applied themselves to devoutly contemplating God and aspiring to him, as the only good. When the sensible, natural, this-worldly part of their natures moved, then, and only then, was it that they turned to these institutions.

The doctor of divinity then asked, "What has Infidelity done for humanity?" We will tell. It has given us all that we know. Taking each of the sciences in turn, it may be found that before Infidelity rose the science was grounded on texts of the Bible and dogmas of the church; that it was ridiculously wrong; and that the clergy maintained its truthfulness, and suppressed all who disputed it, by persecution. It will be found that the true doctrines of each science were broached in contradiction of the teachings of the church, in direct unfaithfulness or infidelity thereto; and that they have obtained acceptance only by bitter strife against it, and as its power has waned and Freethought has risen. Or we may put this answer in other words, by naming some of the truths which we have just asserted Infidelity has erected in contravention of Christianity. It has informed us that the earth moves round the sun and not the sun round the earth; that the earth was made many millions and not six thousand years ago; that it is round instead of flat; that man has existed hundreds of thousands of years instead of six thousand; that he has ever been rising instead of being fallen from a former height; that his moral sense is a natural growth and not a supernatural implantation; that the weather is controlled by natural causes and not by evil spirits; that disease can be cured by medicine and cannot be cured by prayers and relics; that witchcraft never existed, and that old women should not be burnt therefor; that government is of the people and not of the Lord's anointed; that slavery is injurious to the slave and to the master, and should be extinguished. These are a few of the many things that Infidelity to the Bible has given us in the way of knowing. And it has done as much more for us in bringing us into moral doing; it has made us more tolerant, more humane, and more just.

The Outcome of the Congress.

Two weeks ago Mr. Putnam was induced by a few correspondents to ask in these columns what the International Congress should do. We suppose they meant what practical work should be undertaken? It is pretty well settled by the program what the Congress will do. And we do not imagine that beyond the program there is any plan outlined.

Mr. Putnam's suggestions are that the Liberals of the country make united effort to increase the circulation of the Freethought papers, to found a university, to start a summer school of philosophy, to push for legislative action upon three points of our demands—church taxation, abolition of Sunday laws, secularization of public schools.

To these the Investigator this week adds another. Mr. Washburn says: "We must recognize that Christianity as a religious faith is back of every religious evil which we are trying to correct, and it seems to us to be the shortest and surest way to reformation to destroy the faith in which these evils flourish. It may be urged that some Christians are already convinced of the justice of our demands, and that we may more quickly secure victory by not antagonizing these auxiliaries. We do not believe in floating any banner that has not all of our stars and stripes upon it. As a body of unbelievers, we are opposed to the Christian faith. Our enemies—those who are striving for Sunday slavery, for religious instruction in the schools, and for the continuance of the injustice of exemption of church property from taxation—are Christians, and we see no good reason why we should deny the fact or why we should not emphasize it in every way within our power. We believe that Christianity is false, and that this pestilent superstition should be driven off the earth. It has cursed the world ever since its advent, and it is to-day the greatest foe of religious and political justice. We are in favor of having the strongest words possible used against the Christian religion. We can do but little in a political contest until the people are emancipated from the church. Our first work, and the most important, is to attack Christianity; attack it from every point possible; show up the falseness and foolishness of its doctrines, the hypocrisy of its adherents, and rescue the world from the authority of priest and minister. We hope, whatever else the Congress does, that it will declare itself Anti-Christian."

We agree with all of these as in themselves good things. Their practicability is altogether another matter. For instance, we do not believe that the millions necessary to found a university can be raised. The summer school of philosophy seems at present unattainable. The other suggestions, however, are practicable, and can be utilized by everybody. Certainly the Freethought journals should be more enthusiastically supported, for Mr. Putnam rightly says that without them little can be accomplished. This Congress itself could never be held without these channels of communication between Freethinkers. There should be no hesitancy then, on this point.

After the Congress has declared itself opposed to Christian superstition and domination it should pledge itself—and this pledge should mean something, and not be forgotten when the pledgers get home—to support by deed and purse every effort made to push for legislative action upon the three Demands which are uppermost in the public mind at this time—church taxation, secularization of our public schools, and abolition of Sunday laws. The controversy over the Sunday opening of the World's Fair has prepared the way for the last. The efforts of the Catholics make the second of supreme importance, and the pecuniary burdens laid upon citizens by the tax assessors easily force the first to the front.

The exact steps to be taken in these matters can not of course be determined in any set manner. They must develop. Occasions must be improved, opportunities grasped, work be done in a quiet or public manner as is most likely to accomplish results. Mr. Putnam did good work publicly in California and Washington; Captain Adams did wonderfully well in a quiet way in his Canadian province. Both ways are useful, both can be tried. Which shall be used must be left to the judgment of the individuals doing the work. The thing for the Congress to do in the matter is to pledge itself—and not forget its pledges—to back up these efforts in any and every state, and in all ways, where made. No money should be wasted on unimportant detail work. Let it all go to the work of defeating the enemy.

If the Congress does this, and lives up to its declarations, it will be the most important gathering of Freethinkers ever held in this country. The time is ripe, and ripening still, for every effort the church makes demands a counter effort from the Liberals. So let the Liberals say to their leaders, go ahead and do this work and we will back you up. If said heartily and the pledge kept, there is common sense and energy sufficient among the talkers and writers to keep the church bigots dancing on hot gridirons about all the time. At any rate they will know they have had a fight, and be a little cautious in consequence.

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

Freethinkers, Attention.

The headquarters of the Freethought Federation until October 1st will be 17 South Curtis street, Chicago. Please send all communications for Samuel P. Putnam, president, or John R. Charlesworth, secretary, to this place. All Liberal visitors are cordially welcome. Call if possible between 9 and 12 in the morning. Liberal papers and publications will be for sale at this office and also at Henschel's Academy, 517 W. Madison street, during September and until after Congress. Liberal meetings every Sunday evening during September, and International Congress from October 1st to October 8th, at Henschel's Academy.

The late Charles Bradlaugh's journal, the National Reformer, announces that after October 1st it will suspend publication. Lack of adequate support is the cause assigned. The editors, however, hope to make a monthly magazine, to be called the Free Review, self-sustaining. Mr. Foote's paper, the London Freethinker, has been forced to double its price in order to make both ends meet financially.

A correspondent directs notice to a Freethought lecture at Lawrence, Kansas, that pleased him greatly. It was by Thomas Dickson, of the Kansas bar. Among the thoughts it contained was that every man has a brain whose function is the production of thought, and the conclusions of honest thinking ought never to be charged as sins, however much opposed to so-called fundamental truths. There is, said Mr. Dickson, a diversity in nature, every brain having an identity of its own, and when one man robs another of this identity, or dwarfs the mind of a child with theories he himself cannot demonstrate, he commits a crime against nature. The greatest property a man can enjoy is an absolute title to the elements which constitute himself. Investigation generally precedes man's belief in all things except religion, and had the same time and energy that has been wasted in defense of the conceptions of the primitive man been devoted to investigating nature, man would be far above his present development. Man has been a standard by which all things have been measured. That belief is the result of evidence, and not an arbitrary act of the mind, was shown by numerous illustrations. Every man is endowed by nature with reason, and that it is a better guide than all the revelations ever made unto the sons of man, and that the intellects of the present century have more real information as regards nature than was possessed by all the gods that ever lived on Mount Olympus. Mr. Dickson said that Christ made many mistakes as a teacher of pure philosophy, and that he seemed to have in his heart an utter disregard for every institution erected on the virtues of man.

A Catholic priest of New York city having praised the charities of his church, a Protestant doctor of divinity writes to the Herald some things about those charities. These we are glad to hear, and to have the public hear. We are pleased to have the rogues take turn at exposing one another. The first thing is, that of the persons requiring charitable assistance seventy-seven per cent are Catholic. This does not speak well for the capacity of the Catholic church to instill the moral virtues of foresight and providence into its following. Next the Protestant doctor proclaims the truth, so often stated by us, that the Roman Catholic church has a great many schools where poor children of all denominations are taken in, with the hope of making them Roman Catholics, but they have no charitable institutions where adults of all denominations are received, showing that her object is proselytism rather than open-handed and open-hearted charity. The doctor's next point is a noticeable one. It is: "A successful charity worker in our day must be an expert reader of character and have a thorough knowledge of general life. If he has not these qualifications the greater part of his time will be spent ministering to frauds to the neglect of the worthy. Now, the people who do the greater part of the charity work in the Roman Catholic church are the sisters, whose knowledge of life is almost nothing, shut up from the world, many of them not even reading a newspaper. And when they are out the costume they wear prevents them getting any idea of what is going on around them. What, then, can these simple-minded 'children' do among 'professional beggars' or 'intellectual thieves'?" Nothing. Only waste their own time and somebody else's money." This assertion of our Protestant writer we believe may derive confirmation from the invariable prevalence of excessive pauperism in Catholic countries. The doctor says: "In conclusion let me add that my years of experience in charitable work lead me to say that apart from the Roman Catholic schools her charities are doing very little for the general public."

Gotham Gleanings.

The Rev. Mr. DeCosta, of the Episcopal church, calls for the union of American Protestantism against the church of Rome; and he proposes for the consolidated force the rallying cry, "Loyalty to Christ!" as contradistinguished from "the modern transient rallying cry, 'Loyalty to the pope!'"—Evening Sun.

But whether the cry be "Loyalty to Christ!" or "Loyalty to the pope!" the meaning remains the same—"Down with Freethought!"

An industrial and financial crisis is upon the country. North, South, East, and West, the situation is everywhere the same. Factories have closed, mills have shut down, the busy whirl and hum of labor has ceased, and in its place rises a cry for food. Thousands of families willing to work, are suffering the greatest privation and degradation, with the alternatives, starvation or suicide, staring them in the face. In New York, as in every other city, the case is the same—enforced idleness, the pitiful wail of despair, and the petition for "daily bread."

Yet in contrast with this gloomy picture let me point out another. During this season of calamity, for such it is, there have been two Presbyterian churches with seating capacities for six thousand each with a separate chapel and parsonage attached erected in this city. One Episcopal church has been building a new church edifice, two more have been enlarging their seating capacities, one to almost double its former number, and a third has laid the foundation for a large parish school. Another has completed its main building, and is looking forward to the erection of supplementary buildings. The work on the cathedral of St. John the Divine has gone on without interruption. Three Baptist churches have been erected, one of which is building a costly parish house and parsonage. One Methodist church is about to begin the construction of its new main edifice. A Collegiate Reformed church has been completed, and decorated and furnished in a most extravagant and luxuriant manner, while funds are being collected for the building of a new uptown Catholic church.

"But," it has been argued, "all this building gives employment to many who would otherwise have nothing to do." Bosh! They do not believe it, and neither do I. Churches are not factories nor dry-goods stores. They are not money-earning, but money-taking institutions. And every cent gathered in the collection-baskets is "taken" from the pockets of the workingman and the mouth of the poor. I always gave Judas Iscariot credit when he suggested that the ointment might have been sold for the benefit of the poor, and I have a similar feeling in regard to these new church lands and edifices.

The other day the following card was placed in my hand: "The Fulton Street Daily Noon Prayer-Meeting (113 Fulton st., or 58 Ann st.) is for you! Come! Ask, and it shall be given you. Seek and ye shall find." And on the reverse was, "His divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness" (2 Peter i, 3).

How many, I inquired of myself, during the past few months or weeks, how many petty shopkeepers on the verge of ruin, how many wretched seamstresses, earning scant pittance from Christian employers, how many workingmen when the mills have shut down, how many merchants with failure before them, how many a mother watching her child slowly starving, how many in all conditions of life, have echoed and reechoed this cry! How many have asked, how many have sought, and how many have found! Think of the despair, the awful burdening despair, as one arises from a prayer of faith unanswered. The last cent is gone, the last loaf is eaten, the candle has burnt out in its socket; the last hope has fled. Is there any wonder that there are wretched beings who regard the river as a mercy?

Professor Mohammed Alexander Russell Webb, the Mohammedan missionary, has been very active lately. An article in the Herald of recent date attests Mr. Webb's ability as well as the superiority of Mohammedan morals to those of Christianity. Mr. Webb very correctly says that he has made more converts in six months than Christian teachers have made from Mohammedanism in a lifetime, and reminds us that there is a mosque in London with a congregation of three hundred Englishmen.

Following this comes the arrival of Mrs. Annie Besant and several fellow Theosophists, prominent among whom are Professor Ganendra, Nath Chakravarti, a Brahmin, Hevavitarana Pharmapala, a Buddhist, and Miss F. H. Muller, who came over on the Paris. During the voyage Mrs. Besant was kind enough to deliver a lecture, at the close of which Dr. Lyman Abbott proposed that Mrs. Besant should be given a vote of thanks. Thereupon, one Dr. Brandeth, of pill and piety fame, asked Mrs. Besant in an aggressive tone of voice if Christianity was not good enough for her, and wanted to know what good Theosophy had ever done the world, adding that Christianity had lasted eighteen hundred years and would last much longer. Mrs. Besant's reply, however, squelched the irritable man of medicine.

The unconcerned reply of Mr. Virchand A. Gauthi, a priest of the Jain sect of India, as to how long ago a priest of the same community had ever left that country, "Oh, about two thousand years," is significant. But neither Christianity, Mohammedanism, Brahminism, Buddhism, or Theosophy, which underlies the whole, have yet experienced a sufficient time-test. One thing alone, and that is what man has done for his fellow-man, has outstood the trial of ages.

Every religion that is in the right sense of the word a "religion" is racked, torn, and upset in its attempt to keep pace with the scientific developments of the times. The picture presented to the mind is that of an elderly lady, with numerous shawl-straps, band-boxes, and packages, which she is continually dropping and stopping to pick up again, trying to keep abreast of a limited express train. Poor old lady! She really thinks she is ahead.

NO. IV.

DEAR SIR: When I behold things in imagination, either with my eyes open or closed, I see in a very different fashion from that in which I see in dreams or in ordinary, everyday life. And so do you. I can recall in imagination scenes of the past, or build air-castles in the future; I can even see the dismayed expression of your countenance ere you reach the end of this letter. But all this is in imagination, and I know it to be so. I am conscious all the time of my material surroundings and can easily distinguish between the reality and the revery. But in dreams, as you and I both know, the case is quite different. Then we know no other than that what we behold or experience is the reality, and the only reality—we are conscious at the time of nothing else. The dream is never a dream until we wake from it. This stage of existence which we call real life may prove likewise to be but a dream when we awaken out of it at last.

But come, brother philosopher, let us cease this idle skirmishing and get down to business. We might continue to whip the devil around the stump in this aimless fashion for an indefinite period with no other result save to wear out the patience of our indulgent public and our still more indulgent publisher. No battle can be successfully waged except on solid ground; so no argument can be conducted except on definite premises which the contestants are agreed to hold to. I am willing to stand by every positiv statement I have made, with all the logical consequences thereof, and am prepared to fight it out on these lines if it takes all summer.

Before I can define spirit or demonstrate its existence to your satisfaction, you must condescend to consider attentively some of the questions which you have hitherto mainly succeeded in dodging. I will here reiterate the most important of those which I put to you in my last communication, but which you have persistently ignored, and which are all capable of being answered by a simple yes or no. Please give me a definite reply to all of them, and then be prepared to hold your ground upon either issue. Here are my questions:

Have you ever seen objects in your dreams which were not among your material surroundings at the time?

Did you see them with your material eyes?

If not, with what eyes did you see them?

Can we see at all without eyes of some sort?

You say of spirits, "If an entity, they must be something." Most assuredly. "If something they must be possessed of organs, parts, and constituents." To be sure. "If possessed of constituents, it must be in the power of such spirits, at least through their 'mediums,' to so inform the world." Well, my dear sir, my spirit, through the medium of my material body, is endeavoring to inform you of its nature and constituents; but its success will depend largely upon the extent of your knowledge and understanding of the nature and constituents of your own spirit.

You say that "they [spirits] have failed so far to name a single element contained in the spirit body." Let me name a few of them for you. Intelligence, thought, memory, affection, will, are some of these constituents. The memory is properly speaking an organ of the mind, and like every other organ may be strengthened and developed by exercise. In the spirit world, it is said, thoughts become visible and affections audible. To a certain extent they are so here. When you use the expression "I see your idea," you do more than merely use figurative language; you speak from an instinctive recognition of the truth, and spiritual instinct is as reliable as any physical instinct can be.

If oxygen, hydrogen, iron, etc., could be embodied in spirit-form, it would no longer be a spirit form but a very material one. To insist that spirit must be composed of matter is about as logical as to insist that the French, German, Hebrew, or any other language should consist of English words arranged according to the laws of English speech, in which case it could not be other than the English language.

If evolution proves that nature, or anything else, can bestow what it does not possess, then evolution teaches a self-evident absurdity, having no more claim than any other fallacy upon the credence of rational minds. Whenever you can show that anything can bestow what it does not possess, I shall be ready to bestow upon you a sum of money which I certainly do not possess, expecting to receive from you in return the Kohinoor or some other costly gem which you do not possess.

You ask if my parents did not bestow upon me talents entirely absent in themselves. Most assuredly not. It is true that perfume is not needed in the black soil to produce the rose which produces the delicate aroma; but it is also true that a rose seed or cutting is necessary. Life has never appeared on this planet to our knowledge save as the product of antecedent life, and that not in a rudimentary but in a fully developed form "after its kind." To claim otherwise is to make a bald assumption for which nature affords us absolutely no precedent whatever. It is about as easy to prove that mind could produce itself independently of antecedent mind, or that a race or species could elevate itself without the intervention of any higher power, as that a man can lift himself from the ground by tugging at his own boot straps—and about as reasonable. To attempt to disguise the absurdity and impossibility of such an assumption under the high-sounding but meaningless (as used) terms of "development" or "evolution" is but to throw dust in the eyes of rationality, and bamboozle common sense.

It is undoubtedly true that as we must look beyond nature for the intelligence that produces mind, so we must look beyond it for the cause of idiocy, deformity, brutality, lust, and crime, though not precisely to the same source.

You ask if I have ever been in love. Well, no, not very deeply. The fact is, I find it difficult—very—to grow enthusiastic over any mere combination of oxygen, hydrogen, iron, or carbon, and do not find them much more irresistible in the guise of masculine humanity than when in the form of well-cooked edibles the same elements lie before me on the dinner table. And I could about as easily form a romantic attachment for a haunch of roast beef, a dish of potatoes or salad, a suit of clothes, or a tailor's dummy, as for any so-called man who consisted merely of physique and nothing more. Love being with me a spiritual rather than a physical attribute, I instinctively look for a responsive soul upon whom to bestow it, and the evidence of a lack of spirituality in anyone toward whom I might be waxing sentimental, would very promptly chill enthusiasm and dull interest.

Of course I cannot perform the feat of divesting any object of size, extension, or weight without removing any of its material, any more than you can "abstract extension and omit all material" in order to find space. I am afraid my friend has not read enough on some subjects or he would hardly attribute the origin of learning to the brain of ignorance. For myself, I have read but very little of late years, being too much occupied in other ways, but I have done a good deal of thinking.

If we should appear at the International Congress this fall it would be necessary, I rather think, to go in clothing as well as corporeity, or I fear we should be compelled to be absent. Where we are our clothing—or a portion of it, at least—is pretty apt to be, which does not prove, however, that we are identical with our clothing.

If you are content to be merely an animal, well and good; speak for yourself, however. For my part, I should be ashamed to be nothing more. While I am ready to admit that I am an animal, I am convinced that I am an animal plus vastly more than any animal has or ever had; and I have no idea that I shall "die like a brute," Brother Wettstein's fiat to the contrary notwithstanding.

You must look even higher than "the men in the dugout" for the source of original ideas. The pioneers of thought, the originators of ideas that have moved the world, have ever been the highest, not the lowest, of the race.

My idea in regard to the heathen deities is not that they are "false gods," as you term it, but that they are only so many more or less perverted mental images of the one Divine Being—human reflections of a Divine Reality. Now, while no reflection can exist without a substance to be reflected, the accuracy of the reflection will depend largely upon the nature of the reflecting medium. Should you behold yourself, for instance, in either a convex or a concave mirror, the result, I fancy, would hardly be satisfactory, nor do I think you could be induced to admit that either reflection was an adequate representation of your own comely countenance. The heathen idol, which in itself is nothing, as St. Paul says, having eyes that see not, ears that hear not, etc., is yet the grotesque and distorted shadow of omnipresent Deity. A shadow is nothing in itself, but it points conclusively to the substance that has caused it; so the various and multitudinous gods and idols of the pagan, Mohammedan, and Christian world testify to the Infinite Divine Reality so dimly perceived, so differently understood, that stands behind them all.

My conception of the Divinity may be, and I trust is, higher than that of the average heathen idolator; but I do not claim, therefore, that it is the highest conception possible. Indeed I know it is not, from the very fact that it grows with my growth and rises as I rise, as the stars appear to rise with us above the horizon as we climb the mountain peaks. To attempt at any stage to set a limit to this growth in the human mind of the conception and perception of Deity, to impose even the highest idea yet attained as a finality upon the race, would be to change the worship of God into idolatry—the worship of a human image embodying human imperfections instead of the infinite completeness of the Divine Father of Lights, from whom cometh every good and every perfect gift, every ennobling aspiration, every pure thought, every kindly, generous impulse.

You say, "All races and nations originally having been alike ignorant concerning abstract existence and natural phenomena, all alike conjectured a god in their own image to explain matters;" a statement which is pure assumption on your part, and whose persistent defense would be, according to your own showing, rank dogmatism, since it is certainly "beyond proof and contrary to knowledge, reason, and analogy." For the testimony of tradition, history, personal experience, intuition, and enlightened reason are all against your assertion, which has only your unsupported affirmation to sustain it. We have every reason to believe, and none to doubt, that the nations and races of remote antiquity knew much more concerning abstract existence and natural phenomena than we do; and with regard to prehistoric races we have no adequate data upon which to base an inference. I have no hesitation in saying that there are far more data in our possession to-day relating to the nature and phenomena of that spirit world into which we so soon must enter than we have of the habits or notions of prehistoric men; and that the former are of far more practical worth and importance to us.

Your objections as to the inadequacy of a possible God occupying a space of a thousand and million miles in extent, to govern an infinite universe, will all fall to the ground as soon as you have learned to abstract ideas of time and space from your reasonings, and realize that spirit is wholly independent of these material conditions. Meanwhile let me remind you that God is omnipresent and therefore does not require "years" to get anywhere, any more than I need to traverse the space between my home and Rochelle in order to think of you.

Awaiting your reply to my previous questions, which I trust you will meet squarely, regardless of consequences to your position or mine, I now yield you the floor.

A. AUGUSTA CHAPMAN.
Butternut Grove, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1893.

Origin of Worship.

In studying the mythologies of the ancients, it seems at first sight that man's ideas of gods had their origin in the phenomena of nature. Thunderstorms, earthquakes, tornadoes, and the sun, moon, and stars, and seasons, summer, autumn, winter, and spring, and all things they could not comprehend, they ascribed to supernatural causes. There thus were some powerful being or beings, who ruled them for good or ill, and in whose hands they were powerless; and sacrifice or placation of some sort became the most urgent duty of their lives. These natural-phenomena gods, however, in my opinion, are a later creation, and have no place in the earliest mythologies, where beasts were worshiped as gods. Reading this beast-worshipping period carefully, we are forced to the conclusion that the bull was the first, only, and universal god of the Aryan and Semitic races for long ages, and has stamped itself on all the worship of to-day. Osiris, the earliest god of the Egyptians, was a bull, or they would not have kept a bull as his vicar or representative on earth, the god Apis. Indra, the god of the Hindoos, was both sun and bull, and the clouds were his cows, and he was called the milk-compeller, and in some far-distant period of his history he killed Vritra, the serpent. Zoroaster, an early Persian religious reformer, although fire was the symbol of deity in some of his invocations, addressed him as "Thou great primal bull;" and so on throughout all the tribes of the Aryan and Semitic races their highest ideal of might, wisdom, and majesty was the bull, therefore god, and the serpent all that was evil, therefore the devil. In some of our own invocations in use to-day we find lingering traces of that ancient bull-worship, for instance: "Turn not away thine ear, O Lord. Listen to the voice of my supplication. Bow down thine ear," etc. These invocations were evidently addressed to some animal that could turn away its ear or walk beyond earshot. And as no expression will take permanent root in language which is not strong and expressive at the time of its formation, these old invocations must have been all of this, for they still retain their place to-day when a moment's thought will convince any thinker that with our notions of deity they are simply absurd. The idea of God's omnipresence forces the belief that of necessity he knows every thought of our heart and every word we utter, whether blasphemy or prayer, and to beg as a favor what we believe we cannot escape is surely absurd. And, consequently, the god worshiped in those days must have been a very different god from the god worshiped in these. And between the fierce, repenting, inflammable, and explosiv vengeance-loving God of the Old Testament, and the calm, dignified, and immutable God of to-day, there is a wonderful difference. But the bull in his wild state is still very fierce, treacherous, and fond of vengeance, and bears such a strong resemblance to the ancient god that, if they are not the same, it is a very excusable case of mistaken identity. In Ex. xxxiii we are told that Moses desired to see God in all his glory, but God told him he could not look upon his face and live. In the words of the book: "I will put thee in a cleft of the rock and will cover thee with my hand as I pass by, and I will take away mine hand and thou shalt see my back parts, but my face shall not be seen." And at this time when they entered into this compact, they were chatting face to face as man to man—proving, if it proves anything, that the ancient God was very far from being the same at all times, therefore not unchangeable, therefore not the God of to-day. When a bull is in a quiet, ruminative mood, as a general thing he is harmless, but when in his glory, that is, fighting, it is safer to take a peep at his tail than his horns (this is probably one of the oldest traditions of the human race). The passages in the Bible are so numerous where the description of the ancient God tallies so exactly with the well-known temper and disposition of the king of the bovine tribe, that we cannot help thinking it true, as Darwin puts it, that man evolved from the monkey, man's God evolved from the bull. As man rose in the scale of the animal kingdom, the bull went down, and the priests to stamp out Infidelity were obliged to create a spiritual or heavenly bull. Here the question arises, Why did ancient man worship this ugly-dispositioned beast? And from the old traditions it is very plain it was for the sake of self-preservation and temporal advantage, and in all probability for nothing else, for long ages, until it became a necessity to graft on the spiritual and heavenly to prolong the life of priestcraft. Geology and our own instincts throw a little light on why man worshiped the bull, and the instincts of the bovine tribe confirm them. Geology proves beyond a doubt that for a long period of time before mammals appeared on the earth it was inhabited by cold-blooded animals, among whom the serpent family throughout all its branches was fierce, powerful, and numerous. One branch of this family, the flying serpent, was in all probability the most dangerous and destructive of them all. A great many old legends and traditions of the human race confirm this view, where a fiery flying serpent or great red dragon plays a prominent part in the old tale, bringing death and destruction with it. These old legends were looked upon as mythical, as the flying serpent was considered a myth until resurrected by geology. In the Bible we are told God brought the children of Israel to time by the aid of some fiery serpents (Num. xxi, 6). In Rev. xii—an old legend of the troubles the human race and their gods had with the great red dragon—it is put forward as a prophecy, but has every appearance of ancient tradition. From our own instincts we find that the human and the serpent families must have passed long ages at enmity, and our shuddering dread for all serpents tells us that the serpent was the aggressor and scourge. Some children who would pet a lion are terror-stricken at sight of a harmless snake, and considering the time we know to have passed since the serpent ceased to be an invincible foe, we may safely conclude that to plant this dread so deep in our nature its cruel oppression must have lasted for a long period of time. When studying our own instincts we ought to remember that no interested party could reach them to pervert them by erasure or interpolation. And when priestly history says man was created a biped and the instincts of the child a quadruped, we must decide in favor of the child, its evidence being unbiased. Take the young of any animal we know and they never make a motion toward locomotion until they attain the position of their parents, which they keep through life; while the young human commences its life journey on all fours as naturally as a young puppy, and the first time its nurse raises it to its feet and leaves it to its own devices, it shows as much nervous alarm and want of instinct for the biped position as a pup when placed on its hind legs for the first time. And the child has no language except the passion-cries of grief, pain, joy, etc., common to all animals; isolate a child from all its kind, and it will neither walk erect nor be able to articulate a word in any language of the human race, proving conclusively that walking erect and word-language are not instinctive, but educational acquirements. And the old instinctive knowledge of the language of our forefathers, although dormant, is still alive and will awaken at the first call when made in the passion-cry language used so long ago. To illustrate: One scream from a human being in agony will excite our sympathies more than all the woes depicted by Dante in his "Inferno." And again we may visit a friend or neighbor, where death has thrust his ice-cold hand, and our heart may be full of sympathy and sorrow for our grief-stricken friends as we listen to the mournful story of their bereavement, but our sorrow soon fades from memory, leaving scarcely a trace behind, but the wild, wordless funeral wail of the Irish or Scottish Highlander will open in a moment a welling spring of pity and sympathy in our hearts which the most pathetic word-language ever uttered could never have reached, and when remembered long years afterward will awaken a feeling of sadness and pity deep in our natures. It will strike any thinker that, unless some old instinct had awakened to life and comprehended these cries to us word-speaking humans of to-day, they could have meant no more than the scream of a locomotive, as in words they told us nothing, and but for that old instinct we would have mistaken them for the cries of some wild animal. Had the first man and woman of the human race been created bipeds using word-language, these instincts would never have existed, and the child's first efforts when able to travel would have been to attain the biped position, and its first attempts at utterance would have been word-language, as it could have had no instincts for anything else. Therefore if we are honest with ourselves we must admit that our instincts teach us that passion-cries must have been used by our forefathers for a far longer period of time and taken deeper root in our nature than word-language, for if we had the same instinct for word-language, and had used it the same length of time, it would have destroyed this older unused instinct. And the same conclusion must be reached in regard to man's position as a biped. Some may object that man's arms are too short to have been used as legs, but we must remember that adaptation is one of the laws of nature, and that from the time man first attempted to walk erect until it was the only mode of traveling, must have covered a long period of time, and during that period the arms would shorten to adapt themselves to their new duties. At this time man must have been a weak, defenseless animal, and if persecuted by some fierce enemy, necessity would force him to create word-language. In this way all defenseless animals, when persecuted by an enemy with whom they are unable to cope, when getting food or amusing themselves, where they are exposed, post sentinels to warn them of approaching danger, and any animal would soon discover that warning cries alone were almost worthless, as in running to escape they might meet the danger in the face. This would cause necessity to invent other sounds to signify things such as tree, rock, river, etc., and using them and teaching them to their children would increase their powers of articulation, and they would keep adding new sounds until an uncouth language was formed, which has grown from then till now, and is growing yet. Several species of animals are forming word-languages of their own, but man has been slow to recognize it, owing to the fact that he was imbued with the belief that word-language was given to himself alone, direct from his God, while all our instincts point to the fact, he created it himself. All helpless animals when pursued by a voracious enemy will fly for refuge to some other animal they think powerful enough to protect them, and some of our forefathers having discovered that the bulls could conquer the flying serpent or great red dragon, their common enemy, they would soon learn to feel a great deal safer when a herd of cattle was close by and look upon them as a far superior animal to themselves; and that is the foundation on which all worship rests, the lower looking up with all reverence to the higher. The instincts of the bovine family are strong evidence in support of the assertion that they fought with and conquered this fiery flying serpent. Nothing will rouse a herd of half-wild cattle to such fury as a red cloth elevated on a pole, and no element of fear seems to mingle with their fury as they rush pell-mell to the charge. Had the contests between their forefathers and this red enemy been of a doubtful character we would have expected, and no doubt found, caution and hesitation in their manner of attack, but they show nothing of this, nothing but confidence, hatred, and vengeance. The love of vengeance in their nature was probably engendered by wrongs inflicted on some far-distant ancestors by this red enemy when they were unable to cope with it. But for long ages before this winged monster disappeared the bovines must have been the dominant and aggressive animals, as their descendants do not wait to be attacked, and show no symptoms of fear in their onslaught. To the color red bovines have no antipathy when it shows no signs of life. A red barn, house, or fence they regard with the utmost indifference, but a fluttering red cloth or dress will excite them to frenzy. We knew a case where a woman wearing a scarlet cloak was pursued by a meek-mannered, mild-eyed, every-day milk cow, and would in all probability have been gored to death but for the timely interference of the owner of the cow. It seems at first sight that the powerful flying serpent discovered by geology would be more than a match for the bull, and for one in all probability so it would, but we must remember cattle always go in herds, and it would be impossible for the serpent to descend on them without exposing its most vulnerable part, the belly, to their sharp, strong, upward-curved horns, and no doubt when man was the inferior animal, looking up to the bulls as gods, they would be far more fierce and fearless, and in all probability would be able to hold their own with any animal on the earth, and the names given to them by their worshipers—"lords of hosts" and "gods of battle"—would be very appropriate. Our forefathers would be intelligent enough to realize the comfort and safety derived from the protection of the bovines, and probably out of gratitude gathered fruits and vegetables that grew where the bulls could not reach them and brought them close enough to the herd to attract their attention, and such is custom that after a few times the bulls would look for them, and sacrifice was established. And we all know how easy it is to make a ringing bell, a mewling cat, or a roaring bull echo our thoughts, and from some imaginatively forefather and a roaring bull came our first "Thus saith the Lord," and the man who first caught the knack of crystallizing his own foolish thoughts into God's commands would become the first law-giver and priest. Our mythological traditions and legends, our own instincts, and the instincts of the bovines all bear testimony that in all probability in this way worship first began. THOMAS WALKER.

Our Duty Toward Watson Heston.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: When I sent friend Heston my contribution, in response to his call for a loan, it was so small that I was ashamed of it; for, as I said to him, I am not yet out of my own financial wilderness, but I concluded that nearly everybody I owe would forgive me under the circumstances.

That the following letter made me sad beyond expression, goes without saying. It is a private letter, which to me is sacred. I have not permission to print it, and may offend my good friend Heston by giving his condition this publicity, which his own pride and modesty have concealed from the public eye; but, after thinking about the matter a few days, I decided that it is my duty, even at the risk of incurring his displeasure, to report to the Liberals of this country through our Freethought publications, the Boston Investigator, THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Ironclad Age, the Freethinkers' Magazine, and the Independent Pulpit, all of them.

Had he made known his real situation to the Liberals of America as he has unbosomed himself to me in the following letter, in which, despite the effort at cheerfulness, he reveals a large measure of grief, discernible between the lines, I believe this noble worker for our common cause would have met with ready assistance from those who are able to render it.

What are we in this world for, if it is not to aid a brother in distress? Is it humane and sensible to withhold food and clothing while he lives, and build him a monument when he dies? Shall our fellow-man call for bread and will we, mockingly, give him a stone? But read his letter:

CARTHAGE, Mo., July 31, 1893.

MY DEAR JAMIESON: Yours, with the "almighty dollar," arrived to-day. I also got your other letter a few days ago. Never mind, my dear brother, about the size of your loan, for I appreciate your letters and friendly interest in my humble self a good deal more than several dollars, although I am glad to get the money right at this time, I assure you. Had I known that a financial panic was coming so fast, when I asked for a loan, I should not have done so, and I hesitated a good while before I ventured to make my wants known; but I was so hard pushed that I felt almost desperate enough to turn pirate, or almost anything but a preacher, in order to get a little more money. The reason I need money is on account of the sickness of my wife. She has been in a very critical condition, and not only needed skillful treatment, but a change of climate, and I have paid out so much of our limited means going about in search of health, paying big doctors' bills, etc., that I am "dead broke," and could not pay for what she so sorely needed.

I thought if I could raise several hundred dollars we could also secure a little home of our own, where we would not be at the mercy of the greedy landlords who want such high rents. Somehow "luck" has been against us for the last six or seven years, and we have grown poorer ever since I have been working in the cause of Free-thought. We have at last begun to sell our household goods in order to raise the funds we need, but times are so hard that we will have to take half their value, or less, if we can dispose of them at all. I am going to send my wife to San Diego, Cal., and I shall follow when I can.

My dear sir, I have very pleasant memories of your debate with Cunningham, and also of a lecture you once gave the Liberal League here, and I should be glad to know what you are now driving at, and how you are prospering.

I have only got $4 yet on the "loan" business, but every little helps, and if I don't get much it will be all the easier for me to pay my debts! I am not easily discouraged, and will manage to pull through some way if I keep able to work. My own health is poor now, and I shall get out of this climate for good as soon as I can get in shape to do so. Poor health and doctors' bills have played the devil with my worldly possessions in the last few years, but "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," you know, and I suppose "I ought to be thankful that it is no worse," as our Christian friends would say. Ha, ha!

Excuse the length of this letter, but somehow I feel like saying even more yet, if I were not afraid I'd make you tired.

Will pay you back as soon as I can get in better shape, and with many thanks for your friendly interest in myself, don't forget that I have long been your sincere friend,

WATSON HESTON.

P. S.—I shall be glad to hear from you if the "spirit" ever moves you to write me.—W. H.

Now, Liberals, what is our duty? We have no God to give to; but we have men and women who are giving their very life to this cause—editors, publishers, lecturers, writers, artists. They devote their brains to the upbuilding of this Free-thought cause, whereas they might, with less effort, acquire wealth.

I say, let us help the living, who are working to free the world from the shackles of superstition, and esteem it a privilege.

W. F. JAMIESON.

World's Fair Notes.

The procession of state days at the Fair is quite magnificent. Wisconsin advances with its famous eagle, New York with its speeches by Governor Flower and Chauncey Depew, and Pennsylvania with its Liberty Bell and Hall of Independence. Vast crowds attend the imposing ceremonies. The boom is on, and people who can spare the money are coming from every quarter. On Saturday the great state of California wheels to the front. It will be a gorgeous day. Carloads of fruit will be ready for free distribution, and the Golden state will no doubt be duly appreciated. The attendance now averages a million per week. As October approaches it looks as if there would be a tremendous rush. The Exposition is making dividends, and the financial outlook is brighter than ever. Perhaps the worst is over, and autumn will pour its wealth into our laps, and prosperity shine through our borders.

The largest attendance on any one day was Fourth of July, with 286,000 paid admissions. Illinois day follows, with 243,000; Pennsylvania, with over 200,000; Wisconsin, with 161,000; New York is next in rank, and then Bohemian day takes precedence, with 157,000. The largest number of paid admissions on one day at the Paris Exposition was in round numbers 400,000. A vast effort will be made on Chicago's day to surpass that number, but it is doubtful if it can be equaled. It is to be remembered that the admission to the Paris Exposition was only twenty cents; and in many cases, by the sale of coupons for prizes the admission was reduced to ten cents. Besides, Paris has a much more compact population to draw from, and hence Chicago will have to rustle to beat the 400,000. Prices of accommodations near the Fair gates are beginning to double up. Within reasonable distance of the grounds, however, the rates are about the same. On the West Side and the North Side charges are still normal. The price of a dinner ranges all the way from fifteen cents to $1. One can get along cheaply if they make arrangements in time.

The Sunday-closing matter has now become an amusing and roaring farce. The church party is completely bowled out. It has received a black eye of colossal proportions and long may it remain thusly. The decision of Judge Goggin was a dramatic surprise. It is seldom that a judge is so bold. I admire his pluck and vigor. He evidently understands the law, for his decision cannot be reversed until the snow flies. It is doubtful if anything more is done, for Judge Stein, who first granted the injunction, is now the only one who can come to the "aid of the Lord," and he is away on a vacation and the Lord can't reach him.

It is refreshing to have a judge declare that precedent is not always law. It is absurd that justice in this country is bound by the common law of England. What has that to do with America after the Revolution? Why do not judges understand that precedent is only a guide and not an authority—that no decision of the past is absolutely binding upon any court to-day? And yet, in order to force Christianity upon this people, the Supreme Court goes back to the precedents of the Middle Ages. When will our judges be as independent as Judge North, of THE TRUTH SEEKER ranks, who made a decision in the courts of Nevada of which it was complained that it was against precedent. Judge North replied: "I make a precedent myself, as I have a right to." Of course, every judge has that right. If the first judge who sat on a bench had it, then every judge has it. Where is the law that forbids a judge to make an original decision on the merits of the case, unless there is a statute law to settle the matter? This "common law" is all humbug. A statute law of course is imperative, but what is common law but common opinion, and to be brushed aside if need be by common sense? It is time for America to be a law unto herself, and not creep and crawl through the Dark Ages to find the opinion of some judge who merely echoed the barbarism of his time. Is law like theology, non-progressive, and is the first judge all-wise and every succeeding judge a tame copyist? It was a grand declaration of independence when Judge North said, "I myself have the right to make a precedent."

Judge Goggin has also given a severe flagellation to the police of the city for arresting people without a warrant and shooting them to death. He says he would hang these policemen. But policemen seem to think they have a right to murder. It is about time to stop this tyranny of the police, and Judge Goggin has courage enough to begin the work.

There were twenty-five thousand people at the Fair last Sunday, and this shows how many would attend the Fair if it were really open on Sundays as on other days. Nearly all the exhibits are closed. The machinery is not running, nor the fountains, and there are no means of conveyance on the lagoon. All is quiet, funereal, and solemn. It is like paying fifty cents to go into a graveyard, and yet twenty-five thousand people pay for this privilege, with plenty of cold water thrown upon them. There seems to be a studied effort on the part of the directory to make Sunday-opening unpopular. The directory in this matter has acted like a weather-cock. They don't seem to have any settled convictions. "They are everything by fits and nothing long." They act as if they were scared out or bought out. Had they had any courage or real conscience in the matter, they could have made Sunday the most popular of all days, as it was in the Paris Exposition. Chicago may be a great city, but its directory in this case has acted like a set of provincials, and given to Chicago the aspect of a great country town. They might do to run a county fair, but as for a World's Fair, that is entirely beyond their ability. They might take a lesson from the state of Iowa, which keeps its state fair open on Sunday, and in a most successful manner. Chicago is behind the times yet. It can't run a World's Fair on Sunday, and that puts Chicago away behind Paris and New York. I think even Boston could beat it, and as for Coney Island, that is far ahead. Chicago had better cease its boasting until it has learned to make the Sunday a genuine holiday.

What Chicago couldn't do of its own gumption the law has compelled it to do. The church party has found that the law is a two-edged sword and can cut both ways. The orthodox party are Anarchists of the worst type—not philosophic Anarchists, but crude, savage Anarchists. When the law is on their side, they use it with all the power of a despot; when against them, they are willing to break it without any compunction. When it comes to the real point the orthodox bigots are the most lawless in the land, for they only want law when they can use it to crush those who think differently from themselves.

Take it altogether, we have won quite an advantage on purely legal points, and this will be of great service in the future. The decisions of Judge Stein and Judge Fuller contain admirable declarations of certain Constitutional principles which are for the benefit of the people, and what Judge Goggin has done is perfectly legal and cannot be questioned as a matter of judicial right. As we necessarily have a legal battle to fight, it is well to get all the points of advantage we can, and we certainly have checkmated the church party in the courts of the land, which hitherto have been the stronghold of the ecclesiastical reactionaries.

The Catholics are holding a congress, and in point of numbers and in ability I think it surpasses the other church congresses. They have some very shrewd leaders in that church, and they pretty well understand what they are about, and are willing to learn a thing or two. It is seldom that a church conference is willing to listen to such an honest declaration as this. The Catholics have the wisdom of humility.

One of the marked papers was that read by Mr. Elder, of New Orleans. He is evidently a man of intelligence, great observation, and serious thought. In speaking of the church and its source of weakness in the American republic, he said:

Let us tell the truth to ourselves. Our inferior position—and it certainly is inferior—is owing greatly, chiefly, almost wholly, to ourselves.

The great men of this nation have been, and are, and will continue to be, Protestant. I speak not of wealth, but of brain, of energy, of action, of heart. The great philanthropists, the great orators, the great writers, thinkers, leaders, scientists, inventors, teachers of our land, have been Protestant.

What does surprise me is the way we have of eulogizing ourselves—of talking buncomb and spread-eagle, and of giving taffy all round. I am sorry to say that I cannot well join in this enlivening pastime. But I truly cannot. When I see how largely Catholicity is represented among our hoodlum element, I feel in no spread-eagle mood. When I note how few Catholics are engaged in honestly tilling the honest soil, and how many Catholics are engaged in the liquor traffic, I cannot talk buncomb to anybody. When I reflect that out of the seventy million of this nation we number only nine million, and out of that nine million so large a proportion is made up of poor factory hands, poor mill and shop and mine and railroad employees, poor government clerks, I still fail to find material for buncomb, or spread-eagleism, or taffy-giving.

They have a nice little bit of a hell in the Moorish Palace, Midway Plaisance, which can be seen in all its horrors for five cents—cheap enough. I am willing to pay that amount just to see it, although I don't think I care for any further experience. You can behold the liquid flames and streams of fire, and the poor victims rolling and tumbling, and the devils punching them in with long poles, while the big devil is looking on with a smile of satisfaction that would grace the features of an orthodox God. A Catholic priest is looking on; whether to aid the devil himself or to receive his own reward I don't know. At any rate, he doesn't seem out of place. The whole thing is got up in quite skillful fashion and has a very scary aspect. One old woman, gazing at it with perturbed spirit, cried out:

"How good we ought to be after looking at that!"

"You ought to be good before looking at it," said friend Denny, who was standing near by.

Our Congress is looming up in bright array. We have visitors now from all parts of the country, from California, Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Florida, and New England, as well as from the adjacent states. They report great interest in our work throughout the country. The Congress evidently is becoming a magnet of attraction. Hundreds of letters have been received, and I guess Mr. Charlesworth has written about a thousand letters since he began his work. It is no child's play to get up a Free-thought Congress. There is a multiplicity of labor about it—to arouse enthusiasm, arrange forces, attract public attention, and make a lasting impression, not only by what is said in the Congress, but by the appearance and surroundings of the Congress itself. This will give a great and fruitful impulse to the cause.

SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

"Four Hundred Years of Free-thought."

Since my last report I have received nearly one hundred names. There are over two hundred and fifty subscriptions now, and the publication of the book is assured. This is exceedingly gratifying to me, not only because I shall enjoy the work laid out before me, but because I think that it will be of great service to our cause. The history of the last four hundred years has not been written from a purely Free-thought point of view. The interrelations of its great geniuses, and the work they have wrought have not been placed before the reader as a grand and harmonious whole. We see Free-thought in fragments, and not as a continuous and universal movement. Free-thought has been a great, steady, and onward current in human affairs. It has been a persistent force in the varied domains of human actions. What a record there is—Copernicus, Galileo, Kepler, Bruno, Spinoza, Des Cartes, Locke, Hume, Kant, Comte, Bacon, Comenius, Froebel, Spencer, Holyoake, Shakspeare, Gibbon, Shelley, Voltaire, Paine, Darwin, Bradlaugh, Mazzini, Garibaldi, Garrison, Ingersoll, and many others—and what a world of activities these shining names represent. As I progress the work broadens and deepens upon me. New avenues of research are constantly opening. I find that after Congress I must devote two months of hard labor to the book, and perhaps more. I am sure that those who aid me in this enterprise desire that I should take plenty of time for a task so important as this. The cost also will be greater than at first contemplated. I might get out a cheap edition, and so save a few hundred dollars; but I shall do nothing of the sort. I intend to publish a beautiful book—one that Freethinkers will be proud of, not simply on account of the matter it contains, but the attractive form in which it is presented. We have plenty of pioneer and rough work to do, but that should not prevent us enjoying the elegancies of life; for art and beauty belong to Freethought as well as toil and danger, and I know that those who subscribe for this book will be better pleased to have me spend a few hundred extra dollars on the book, and have its outward appearance excellent and not cheap and shoddy. I shall want more subscriptions to pay expenses, but I have not much doubt but that I shall get them. I hope that I shall obtain five hundred before Congress. It will be seen that some of my friends subscribe for more than one copy. I hope this good example will be followed. This is a kind of coöperative undertaking, and I want every subscriber to feel that he has a personal interest in its success. Unaided and alone I could not have ventured on so vast an undertaking. I have been most generously supported, and I am glad to announce the absolute certainty of the publication of the book. If there was any doubt at all, the following letter from N. F. Griswold makes the sky perfectly clear. Mr. Griswold has contributed thousands of dollars to the Liberal cause.

DEAR PUTNAM: I beg to assure you that if the want of a needful number of subscribers will endanger or cause delay in the publication of "Four Hundred Years of Freethought," I will guarantee the amount. So go on with the work. Let your pen be unconfined. Write your Freethought book, to enlighten, save, and bless mankind. I hope the time will soon come when every bookstore will dare to nail up over its door Ingersoll's, Putnam's, and other Liberal books for sale, price five cents, up to $5.

I intend to be at the Congress if alive and well. Hoping that you will realize all and more than your most sanguine expectations, I am very truly yours,
N. F. GRISWOLD.

My veteran friend, J. H. Cook, of Kansas, writes:

I am inexpressibly pleased with your forthcoming "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." I have appreciated your unsurpassed descriptions of the World's Fair. It is possible I may have the means and feel well enough to attend the Freethought Congress.

It is delightful to receive the following from Helen H. Gardener, who has done her woman's share to make Freethought to-day more brilliant and hopeful than ever:

DEAR MR. PUTNAM: And so you are to give us "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." It is going to strain even your power to see the rainbow tints to discover much Freethought in a good part of that four hundred years. Still, I don't doubt your ability to do it, if it can be done by anybody, and those of us who haven't the time and ability to dig for the information will be happier and wiser men when we read that book and find out what a lot of Freethought there has been such a long time that we didn't know the first thing about. I mean to improve my mind—not to mention my temper—with the contents of that book. Meantime, good luck with it. Did you receive the nice notice of your World's Fair book which was in the Toledo Blade? I sent it to you. The writer of it is a friend of mine, and sent it to me.

Sincerely,
HELEN H. GARDENER.

With such expressions of good-will and a multiplying subscription list, I have a cheerful though arduous task before me. In adding these many new names, I will say to those who have not yet joined the "five hundred," that I hope they will do so at once, for aid and encouragement now will be better than six months hence. I want to be perfectly free to devote myself to this work, and not have any outside cares or anxieties. Every subscription will be the voice of a friend. It will not be so much money only, but interest, sympathy, and companionship. It will make the toilsome hours golden with bright hopes. I hope to hear right away from every friend. Address me until October 1st at 17 So. Curtis street, Chicago, Ill.

International Congress of Freethinkers.

Once again before the Congress is fully upon us I feel it to be my duty to write something by way of a reminder to the members and the friends of the Federation. Tuesday morning, October 3d, has been set aside for the use of the Federation, at which time the reports of our year's work will be read and the results of our labors given in detail. The Federation is just one year old, and though an organization of comparatively recent date, it has attained a grand roll of nearly thirty-five hundred members. It has done valuable work for the cause of Freethought even in this short time, the details of which are far too numerous to recount here; but we ask that every member will make a special effort to attend the Congress and be present at the morning session of October 3d.

It has been nobly supported in financial matters—a fact which alone perhaps has conduced toward its successful labors. Freethought has now a grand opportunity to make itself both heard and felt. Our principles must still be put before the people and the platform used for good and effective work. Each one that we can win to our side weakens the power of the church, and our cause—the cause of human freedom—is strengthened in due proportion. Thus we must use all our energies in that direction and direct upon the bulwarks of the enemy all the power of argument and the force of logic we may possess.

The powerful motor that lies in political action is far too great to be easily estimated. Wherever Freethinkers are sufficiently numerous to hold the balance of political power no possible means whatever should be spared to put our forces into operation and in good working order. The social standing of any individual church to-day is reckoned by the amount of wealth it controls; but their power and standing as a whole is estimated solely by the number of votes they may command. When, therefore, Freethinkers will use their suffrage for Freethought they too will have something to say, as Freethinkers, in the administration of public affairs. These things our friends should take particular notice of, and try their best to work on these lines, wherever they find it possible so to do. In those districts where Freethinkers have followed this rule, they have, by a strict compliance therewith, been more or less successful. These points the Federation will show up in its reports, and will open out a way for more effective work in the future upon these lines. It had been the intention of Mr. Putnam and myself to start upon a joint campaign immediately after the Congress, but, owing to the financial panic through which we have just passed, and from which we have barely recovered, it has been found impracticable to do so at this time; we have, therefore, decided to defer such campaign until after the winter months have passed. Again, the vast amount of labor in which Mr. Putnam will be involved, consequent upon the publication of his new book, has made it impossible to put it into operation as soon as we had expected. It is now my intention to start eastwards upon a lecture tour as soon after the Congress as possible. My route will be through Ohio, Kentucky, Pennsylvania, New York, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. I have already a few dates fixed upon my tour, and I would request that friends in the states named desiring lectures address me at once concerning them. We must carry on our part of the good work of the Congress. We must keep on working in the field, working for the happiness of man, and not for the glorification of God.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.
17 South Curtis street, Chicago.

Everyone going to Chicago this fall should have a copy of S. P. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" in his pocket. He will find it a great aid to intelligent sight-seeing. Price, 25 cents; 5 copies for $1.

What the New York Herald says:

This is a handy volume to have in your gripsack when you start for Chicago. You can read it while on the way, and so prepare yourself for the wonders of that gorgeous Exposition, and after you get there it will give you a vast deal of useful information, a thousand and one facts, and plenty of interesting statistics concerning the various departments. It is as good a book for this purpose as we have seen.

The Godless Eskimos.

Astoria, Ore., Daily Budget.

There arrived in Tacoma recently Miner W. Bruce, late superintendent of the United States government reindeer station at Port Clarence, Arctic Alaska, in charge of a party of Eskimos from the far and frozen North, who are to appear in the Alaskan exhibit at the World's Fair.

These Eskimos are a singularly interesting people, presenting some subjects for ethnological study that belong to them alone of all the known races of men. They are unique, alone, lost, as it were, in the solitude of an originality as vast and strange as that bleak and terrible North to which they apply the tender name of home.

They have no religion, worship no god, and dream of no future life beyond the narrow horizon of this world. They are kind and affectionate and serious crimes are unknown among them. They marry, but by no ceremony, secular or religious. When a native wishes a wife he takes the first one he finds who is willing to have him and they are very faithful to their husbands.

The Eskimo mothers never beat their children and the cry of a child is rarely heard.

Lectures and Meetings.

J. E. REMSBURG is lecturing to crowded houses in Michigan. He will deliver thirty lectures in that state, and after the Congress make a tour of Wisconsin, Minnesota, and the Dakotas.

MR. FRANKLIN STEINER'S lecture engagements, so far as arranged, are as follows:

Newton,	Ia., Sept.....	17
Woodward,	" ".....	18
Carlisle,	" ".....	20-23
Lyons (afternoon),	" ".....	24
Clinton (evening),	" ".....	24
De Witt,	" ".....	25
Grand Mound,	" ".....	26
Calamus,	" ".....	27
Chicago,	Ill., Oct.....	1

After the International Congress of Freethinkers, Mr. Steiner will return to Iowa and spend the latter half of October and all of November in that state. Address him at Box 882, Des Moines, Ia.

Letters of Friends.

Is Socially Persecuted.

NORTH MEHOOPANY, PA., Aug. 21, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find inclosed money order for the Truth Seeker Library which I see advertised in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which I have taken for years. The Truth Seeker Library is $3. I also want "Infidel Death-Beds," price twenty-five cents. I have been so interested in "Why I Do Not Like the God and Religion of My Parents" that I have read it over and over. It is splendid. We love the dear old TRUTH SEEKER and would gladly add to your subscription list, but we live in the hotbed of orthodoxy, and we cannot even get them to read our paper. We get many a thrust and cold shoulder on account of our Free-thought principles, but they will prevail, as they ought and must. LEVI KELLEY.

The Five-Points People.

CHEYENNE, WYO., Aug. 23, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed $5, for which you will please continue to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER. Also send it to the name and address shown on the inclosed subscription list. There are a great many Freethinkers in this part of God's foot-stool, but they don't seem to be as faithful to principle as the Christians are to dogmas. If they were, what a great blessing it would be to humanity! I have been trying to have your valuable paper sold by the newsdealers here. One of those gentlemen, a believer in the five points, said he would sooner starve than sell a paper of that kind. I think there is very little danger of any of those five-points people starving if there is anything in sight.

Yours fraternally, JOHN DONNELLY.

What in Religion's Place?

JUNCTION CITY, Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $5 for renewal of my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for two years from May 11, 1893. I have tried hard to get a subscriber for you, but it is uphill business here. The people seem to think that they are better off with the old fossil of religion than they would be with the paper; but for me, I will take the paper in preference, and I keep it before the people. I give everyone a copy that will take one and read it. Some like it, and some think it a little too strong, and ask what I would give in place of religion. I tell them liberty and common sense; but they seem to want something to worship, so I tell them to worship nature as we behold it, and then they worship something real.

Yours for Truth and Reason,

J. L. ROWELL.

Wants Names and Dates.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Aug. 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I get your paper weekly on one of our local news-stands. I am much instructed and benefited by its perusal and generally read every article and item in it. Now, I should like to make a suggestion—it is one I am forced to make by circumstances. I was a Catholic; now I am honest enough to say when asked as to my belief, "I am an Agnostic about things outside of this green earth." I say, relative to what religion terms spiritual, "I know nothing." I have many a controversy with a Jesuit priest and very religious laymen, and it would help me wonderfully to hold my end up if, as in the case of a statement in your last made by Dr. Bradford in the beginning of his article on page 486—"It is not two centuries since," etc., etc.—your correspondents would be a little more explicit. If I had the name of that council, where it was held, and all the attendant data, I could then use it, as I would like to, and not have to answer to the return question as to where the council was held that I did not know. Now, my suggestion is to request your correspondents to always when possible give data. It is a great help, and facts are stubborn things. Hoping you will agree with me, and apologizing for encroaching on your valuable time, I am,

Yours truly, J. M. MAXWELL.

Founder of Freethought Grove-Meetings.

NORTH HURON, N. Y., Sept. 4, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It is with feelings of regret that I announce to you and your readers the loss of our friend, J. M. Cosad, who died at his home in Huron, Wayne county, N. Y., Tuesday, August 15th, being in his eighty-third year. He had been as well as usual until a few days before his death, and was supposed to be improving. Getting up in the morning, and after sitting by the fire a short time, he returned to bed, and in a few moments passed away. The funeral took place Thursday, H. L. Green, editor and publisher of the Freethinkers' Magazine, of Buffalo, officiating. Mr. Cosad was the founder of the first Freethought grove-meeting held in this country, in the year 1877; building a short time after a large hall, which he intended to be used for the advancement of Freethought. At his expense he had lectures at different times, but found the people in this section so impregnated with orthodoxy that nothing but the doctrine they had been taught from infancy would bring them together, and the lectures were abandoned. Mr. Cosad was a man of temperate habits, neither using alcoholic drinks nor tobacco in any form; a firm believer in the religion of humanity, and up to the time of his death worked for the cause.

Obituary.

CHARLOTTE, MICH., Aug. 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Died, Aug. 6, 1893, at Orangeport, N. Y., Martin E. Atwood. Mr. Atwood was born in Niagara county, N. Y., in 1822; was a lifelong Freethinker, and a man of many virtues. A wife and five children are left to mourn the death of a good husband and kind father. His children now living are Frank Atwood, of Tonawanda; Mrs. Emma Headley, Albert A. Atwood, and Alice Atwood, of Buffalo county, and Charles Atwood, of Orangeport, N. Y.

In a letter from his daughter, she says: "My father is missed very much all over this part of the country. His good deeds and kind ways gained him many friends; and I don't think he ever had a blemish on his life." This eulogy from his daughter was not because he was taken away, but from the love and respect that all the family felt toward their father.

The children, as also the mother, are united in the belief that deeds, and not creeds, make life worth living.

In a letter to the family, at the death of a brother three years ago, he says: "Death is as natural as birth, and we have no fear from a natural cause that brought us into existence." That letter, as a eulogy to a loved brother, was read at the funeral by Homer Potter, and is preserved by the family as a kindly remembrance from him who so recently passed away.

The writer of this article spent two pleasant weeks at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Martin Atwood one year ago, and the genial good-nature of all the family made home what it should be, a place to enjoy life.

Presage of Future Existence.

MILLS CITY, MONT., Aug. 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: "There is, I know not how, in the minds of men a certain presage, as it were, of a future existence, and this takes the deepest root, and is the most discoverable, in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls" (Cicero).

The above quotation attracted my attention and struck me with such force that it prompted me to investigate. Will you kindly let me know through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER if it is true, and if true how do you account for it?

Yours truly, C. E. WERST.

[There is not a presage of a future existence in "the minds of men." There is one in the minds only of some men. And in the minds of these men there continually are, also, presages that each of those persons is smarter or better than he is, that sundry illusive projects will turn out well, that they will eventually win in the races or the lotteries, and a thousand such flattering things. But the presages of these things do not prove them true, and the presage of a future life does not prove it true. The wish is father to the thought. As to the presage of a future life being "most discoverable in the greatest geniuses and most exalted souls," it is obvious that, as far as the belief in the Christian's future life is concerned, it is most prevalent in the lower orders of the community, and lacking in the eminent. The most unintellectual nations and classes most entertain it, while in calling over the roll of the world's greatest men one will find it but rare ly—vide "The Biographical Dictionary of Freethinkers," by J. Land for a Freethinkers' College and a Freethinkers' Home.

ST. JOSEPH, MO., Sept. 2, E. M. 293.

MR. EDITOR: I see in THE TRUTH SEEKER of recent dates a proposition to build a monument to Colonel Ingersoll in the way of an institution of learning, and another to build a home for aged Freethinkers. I have been thinking over the matter, and have made up my mind to make the following offer in regard to both propositions. To start with, I will state that we (my wife and I) are the owners of Ingersoll springs in Scott county, Kan., together with one hundred and sixty acres of land, and will give five acres for the Ingersoll college, and five acres for a home for aged Freethinkers and orphans of same, on only one condition, viz., that the land shall not be contaminated by any orthodox teachings, and shall be controlled exclusively by Freethinkers or so-called Infidels forever, and when in the future it should fall into disrepute by being under the control of any orthodox or the doctrines thereof, then the title to said lands shall revert back and be vested in my heirs and assigns.

I will say that the springs are of sufficient volume and power to water a city of fifty thousand inhabitants or to irrigate quite a large tract of the fine land adjacent to the springs. I have made a survey of the springs and find there is a volume of fourteen inches square and twenty-eight foot fall in a few rods. The water is soft and good for health purposes and for any and all domestic uses. I will further state that within five miles of the springs there are acres of the finest building-stone in America. The buildings could be built of that stone at very reasonable prices. The land we propose to give is high, level, beautiful land, with a rich soil, and adjoining it there is at least forty thousand acres of splendid level land. The springs are two hundred and fifty miles east of Denver, and very near the geographical center of the United States.

Now, I make this offer in good faith, and if some of our noble Freethinkers will formulate a plan of procedure in the premises, I think we can make a success of the project, and the above offer is not all I will do if we get the matter started on a sure basis.

MR. EDITOR, I hope you will publish this before the Congress in Chicago, Oct. 1 to 8, 1893, as I want the matter known, so we can make it go. It would be one of the happiest days of my life if I could live to see the success of the undertaking.

Yours for the rights of man,

G. G. BECK.

Immortality Viewed as a Result of Evolution.

CHRISTOVAL, ARIZ., Aug. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: In reading your correspondence, I am surprised at the number and bitterness of those who fear the immortality of the soul. I am one who believes in immortality, but not necessarily in the immortality of all men.

The starting-point of the universe is the primordial atom, within which lie all the actualities around us and possibilities beyond that remain to be worked out by law inherent in the atoms that constitute the whole. Inasmuch as man is the result of evolution, why may not the work be carried to a point where, upon the dissolution of the body, there may be a continuation of the conscious mental man under conditions analogous to those surrounding him in the physical world, and where his mentality may act unhampered by the thralldom of the grosser elements of this earth life? Such continuation cannot be more wonderful than that we are here. If, as I believe, immortality is the result of evolutionary growth, it is possible that that evolutionary work may be checked or entirely suspended, and the being have no immortal spark, and die when the body perishes as the flame of the lamp expires when the wick is turned down and the breath is blown upon it. This I believe will account for so many bitter and acrimonious jibes by your correspondents upon the subject of the continuation of life beyond the grave.

I have been in the midst of this fight for over thirty years, and for the last twenty I have read nor heard no newer argument against an after life than what were brought into existence within a few brief years after the advent of modern Spiritualism, which precipitated the discussion.

If our modern Freethinkers could only bring themselves into the frame of mind of our first great apostle, Thomas Paine, and even hope for immortality, they might show a little more charity and a great deal less ex-cathedra knowledge on the subject. Some of them make us exceedingly tired with their long-winded platitudes and pointless argument (so called). It certainly can make no man or woman the worse to believe in a continued existence and that they will have to atone in their own person for every infraction of law, moral and divine. Like the immortal D. M. Bennett, I believe a man or woman may believe in the immortality of the soul—Spiritualism, if you please—and not be a blanked fool.

Yours for the Truth,

O. F. THORNTON.

Freethinkers Have Been Rip Van Winkles.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Aug. 27, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I have read with interest "Sister" Ruth Brettell's letter from Rochester, N. Y., of August 3d, and think "Sister" Ruth entertains good ideas regarding a home for aged Freethinkers. But while a Freethought home is commendable, a university where the seeds of thought may be expanded by the ripening knowledge of the years to be is far more important it seems to me. As I understand it, Freethinkers have few schools. It is true Cornell University, Harvard University, Girard College, and a few other schools are considered Liberal by many, but a correct investigation will reveal the fact that they are canopied by Christian clouds.

Therefore, a Freethought university is what is needed most for the present. It has been well and wisely said, "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." When Freethinkers awake from their lethargy they will then see the necessity of proper education.

If it is a fact that all told there are only seventeen million Christians in America and about one hundred and ten thousand preachers are the mouthpieces of this minority of Christians, does it not reflect discredit upon the majority of Liberals in this country to be chiefly controlled and schooled by the Christians? Freethinkers, wake up! Wake up! You have been the companion of Rip Van Winkle in the mountains altogether too long. A few heroic workers have through all the four hundred years of Freethought in America carried the torches and the masses have been too lazy or indifferent to assist them.

Friends of Freethought, now is your time to rally round the flag of liberty—round the blue, the red, and the stars, and make a magnificent showing at Chicago.

The International Congress, its noble workers—all of them—need your help. The question is, Will you help? I sincerely hope so. Liberals pay school taxes to defray the expenses of schools where superstition reigns and the Bible is read and science dethroned. How long, oh, how long, will you submit to this debasement of your children's progress? I wait for time to answer.

Christians, despite their Bible teachings, have in many cases outgrown their creeds, burst their bracelets of bondage, and illuminated many dark souls and helped cheer them up the summit of truth. I do not wish to say that Christians, all of them, are bad. Neither do I claim that all Freethinkers are good. Hundreds of church-members, like hundreds of Freethinkers, are good friends of mine and I am their friend. It is their religion—belief—that is repugnant to me and not the humanity of their souls.

Great men, who have by brain and heart ascended to the topmost round of fame's ladder and achieved their merited success by their own unremitting diligence, are the men historic readers admiring praise.

That Col. Robert G. Ingersoll has reached with outstretched wings of noble thoughts and kingly deeds the hearts of men—a praise as lasting as the stars—I will never question. And Liberal friends of every clime, who recognize his noble work and worth, admire the man and wish to pay their tribute to him by erecting a monument that time's affecting fingers can never obliterate.

Friends, pause a moment. The literature of many lands blossoms into monuments for Colonel Ingersoll. He has built his own monument, and his countless gems of speech will continue through all ages to enrich the souls of men. Therefore, he needs no monument you can build for him. But what we need is a university built by Colonel Ingersoll and conducted under his management. From great men we naturally expect great things, and Colonel Ingersoll can as easily give half a million dollars for the endowment of an Ingersoll University as some poor devil who talks about making Colonel Ingersoll a present of a monument could give a cent.

Give us more schools and teachers, less churches and preachers, fewer monuments, more joyousness, more of the useful, less of religion and more humanity, then this world will be a very Eden of happiness.

ROBERT R. JONES.

A Christian but Criminal Town.

SHENANDOAH, IA., Aug. 25, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A modern Sodom and Gomorrah is the wicked but thoroughly Christian town of Shenandoah, Ia., familiarly known to the outside world by such significant and euphonious names as Crime Center, Chippyville, Pokertown, Christburg, Hell City, etc., all of which names it richly deserves. Shenandoah is a pretty little town of about twenty-five hundred inhabitants, situated in Page county, about thirty-five miles east of the Missouri river, and about eighteen miles north of the Missouri state line. It has only fourteen churches, and a Christian parrot and idiot factory, misnamed Western Normal College, whose motto is, "Strictly non-sectarian, but thoroughly Christian." For its size Shenandoah has had more murders, suicides, robberies—both legalized and unlegalized—incests, abortions, rapes, adulteries, fornications, bastardies, elopements, drunkards, opium fiends, baptisms, syphilis, lawsuits, church trials, fights, calumnies, scandals, lying, hypocrisies, incendiaries, usuries, etc.—in fact, these good, pious, virtuous, and non-sectarian Christians are guilty of every crime in the calendar, from cigarette-smoking, hazing, and plain drunk, up to compound bigamy and bastardy, fifty per cent interest, and an Omaha massage treatment. The latest scandal in this "strictly non-sectarian but thoroughly Christian" town, was the accidental discovery of the virtuous and angelic Deacon Mell with the virtuous and thoroughly Christian Mrs. Gardiner on his lap. The committee of Christian sneaks and snakes who were watching this good sister's house were not looking for the good Deacon Mell, but were watching for smaller game. At the church trial in the Methodist church, this holy saint, deacon, Sunday-school teacher, Prohibition detectiv, and Sunday-closing bigot confessed the whole business, and like the cowardly cur that he is, put the whole blame on the woman, claiming that she came and sat on his lap, put her "non-sectarian but thoroughly Christian" arms around his beefy neck, kissed his pure and holy lips—unmistakable evidence of her insanity—and otherwise tempted him until he folded his wings and—submitted. Poor, innocent little thing, he should never have wandered so far away from his chapter! They took away his deaconship and teachership just for appearances, but did not expel him from the church because his nickels and dimes are just as good as ever. Oh, the church is a great institution! or, more correctly speaking, a great prostitution. They recently discharged the principal of the public schools, Professor Carroll, for attempting liberties with the little girl pupils. He is very pious, and an active worker in the Rev. Dr. God's grape-patch.

Then the kind and gentle followers of Mr. Jesus H. Christ burnt their non-sectarian but thoroughly Christian college to spite each other and to convince outsiders that it was strictly non-sectarian, but thoroughly Christian. Since the hard times have come the thoroughly Christian Thomas Reed, president of the First National Bank here, has advanced his interest rate from twelve to twenty per cent, just to convince us Infidels that he is "doing unto others as he would have others do unto him," and that he is practicing the following alleged teachings of his bachelor savior: "Give to every man that asketh of thee; and of him that taketh away thy goods, ask them not again" (Luke vi, 30); "But love ye your enemies, and do good, and lend, hoping for nothing again, and your reward shall be great" (Luke vi, 35). Oh, yes, Mr. Christ, Brother Reed has no doubt but that his reward will be great (perhaps more than twenty per cent) if he follows your Populistic advice, but still doesn't intend to take any chances on it. "Sell all that thou hast, and distribute unto the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven" (Luke xviii, 22). Yes, Mr. Luke, Brother Reed is distributing all he has to his poor neighbors (but on gilt-edge security and at twenty per cent interest, payable—by deduction—in advance); so please have some choice treasures ready for Brother Reed when he arrives, and be careful to not assign him apartments anywhere near the good, virtuous Rev. Mr. Bogges's apartments. As Brother Reed is very pious, and also a staunch Republican, you might give him quarters near Guitean's. As a matter of justice, the other bankers here (and every place else, for that matter) are just as thoroughly Christian and onery as Brother Reed. In fact, there are only two virtuous men in the whole town, and they are Col. C. V. Mount and Benj. Clare, and they are no more Christians than Christ was.

There are four weekly papers here, and only one, the Post, dares to tell the truth about anything, and it only dares to speak out upon political matters. If anyone has children home he wishes thoroughly educated in ancient, medieval, and modern idiocy, alias theology and Christianity, and all the mysteries of scientific and classical poker-playing, I can conscientiously recommend the strictly non-sectarian but thoroughly Christian college that is located here. There is no college in the world that affords its students such ample clinical advantages (church scandals and trials) as the non-sectarian but thoroughly Christian college at Shenandoah, Ia.

Grand Christian Exhibit at the Fair.

YPSILANTI, MICH., Aug. 28, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I suppose we may consider ourselves beaten in relation to the World's Fair, not fairly, but by organized bigotry, intolerance, and misrepresentation. Yet, notwithstanding its seeming victory, the church has received a blow it will not recover from in years. The people of this country, having had their attention called to the subject as never before, will be slow to cease their opposition to its further claims to control actions and consciences. After reading the threats of the different sects to withdraw their exhibits if the gates were open on Sunday, I was not very sorry that they have decided to close them. It would have been, to say the least, a great misfortune to have been deprived of seeing some of the most important of religious relics. I had pictured in my imagination some of the things that would naturally find their way to the collections. Beginning with the race, we should expect to see in Exhibit No. 1 the garments worn by our first parents, at the suggestion of the talking serpent that they would be eminently proper, which will be admired, not so much on account of their material and workmanship, as exemplifying the fact that then, as well as now, necessity was the mother of invention. Another article to be seen will be a specimen of scripture wine, said to have been unfermented, and as this exhibit will be under the supervision of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, they will no doubt be able to convince the anxious inquirer why Lot's daughters gave it to their father for the express purpose of making him drunk, and which proved so satisfactory in its results to themselves in both instances. Those who may be anxious to learn the particulars, we refer to Gen. xix, 30-38. All this we suppose was perfectly proper, as no word of remonstrance was forthcoming from heaven or earth. They will no doubt contend that he was shamming, which partly accounts for the success of the undertaking. But the same could not have been said of Noah, who evidently imagined himself in the garden of Eden before clothes were the fashion, and where he also took lessons in cursing. In Exhibit No. 2 will be seen one of the spotted sticks that Jacob placed before Laban's cattle (Gen. xxx); also the signet, bracelets, and staff which the pious old Judah gave to the virtuous Tamar as a pledge of good faith (see Gen. xxi, 12-30); also Joseph's skirt, which he parted with in a hasty retreat, which so disgusted him we will wager he ever wore a roundabout afterward (see Gen. xxxvi, 7-20); also the identical nail and hammer that Madam Jael used in spiking the fleeing Sisera to her tent floor (see Judges, iv, 21). Lovers of music will no doubt be attracted to this exhibit, as it not only contains Deborah's song over the event, but also the Song of Solomon, and Ps. cix, with music set thereto, making it not only rich but racy. In Exhibit No. 3 no doubt may be seen a lock of Samson's hair, taken from his head while asleep by the charming Delilah; also one of the posts of the gate he carried away, together with a section of one of the columns he removed from the temple, killing himself and others; also the jawbone with which he slew a thousand Philistines as they stood round waiting to be killed. This exhibit will no doubt be largely patronized by athletes. Military men will no doubt be very much interested in Exhibit No. 4, as it will show the veritable chariot of Pharaoh in which he pursued the fleeing Hebrews, and which, in consequence of the Lord's removing the linchpins, spilled him into the sea (this last was lately brought to the surface by a vessel while weighing anchor). The other chariot to be seen will no doubt be closely scrutinized, being made of iron, and successfully used by the children of the valley as they warred against the Lord himself. The rams' horns, used with such signal effect by Joshua in throwing down the stones piled up around Jericho, will also receive considerable attention. In fact, they must be considered a stunner. Exhibit No. 5 very likely will show a brace of quails the same as the east wind brought from the sea to feed the manna-cloyed Hebrews, together with the veritable perch the little flock roosted upon (Num. xi, 31-33). The sight of a quail to a Jew from that day to this has been like the sight of water to a rabid animal. In Exhibit No. 6 no doubt will be seen the style of skirt worn by the renowned Boaz. Its extreme length will undoubtedly astonish some, but if they will turn to the book of Ruth, iii, 9, they will at once see the necessity in the case. Exhibit No. 7 will no doubt show the identical saddle used by Balaam, in a good state of preservation, although it may not be thought prudent to produce the animal he rode, as the contrast might not prove favorable to the asses of the present day, the modern ass having fewer legs and more jaw. Witness the diatribe of one of these Rev. asses against the decision of the judges in the case of the World's Fair. His spiritual vision was so clear that he could see a devil in the shape of a black toad at his elbow guiding him in his decision. Another, with the unmistakable bray, is calling upon the Christian president for troops, showing the same desire to swell the scarlet river that the church has always manifested whenever and wherever it has had the ability to do so, and all the little asses rush to shake the hand of him who attempts to belittle President Cleveland in the comparison with Andrew Jackson, imagining that such gibberish makes him a little Simon Magnus, of scripture fame, who was called by his followers "The Great Power of God." Oh, how these followers of the meek and lowly Jesus thirst for gore. Do these mud-spouting geysers expect to intimidate these and future judges who may be called upon to decide a case of constitutional law? I think I hear them say, "Hands off, gentlemen! Attend strictly to your own legitimate business, and you will then have no time to thrust your snout into our trough. Otherwise we may find it necessary to ornament it with a ring." In Exhibit No. 7 we may expect to see the saws and iron harrows that the man "after God's own heart" used in preparing prisoners captured in battle for kingdom come; also the identical dress that this representative of the sheep-cote should have worn, but did not, when gyrating before the maidens of whom he expected to be held in honor. The scriptures are silent as a clam as to whether there were any Dr. Parkhursts present to witness the interesting performance, but we venture the prediction, could the maidens said to have been present have exchanged places with this jumping-jack, not all the barbed-wire fences ever made would have kept them out, because it would have been in the interest of morality, you know, and the glory of God. Space forbids the naming of all that will be shown, but it will be curious to notice the modern improvements made in the rack, wheel, thumb-screws, red-hot pincers, ducking-stool, etc., all of which fill the hearts of the ransomed of the Lord with joy unspeakable.

Exhibit No. 8 no doubt will contain the marriage license and certificate of marriage, with price of the same, of a couple of heaven-made matches (Hos. i and iii); also a barley cake, with a recipe for the same (for particulars see Ezek. iv, 9-15); also the wardrobe ordered for the prophet Isaiah (see Isa. xx, 2-5). This exhibit will not be complete without the family Bible of King Solomon with frontispiece showing his little family in the attitude of family worship, both married and those that ought to have been. To wind up with I expect to see the last edition of the "Crimes of Preachers," published by THE TRUTH SEEKER, showing that the crew that man the old ship Zion to-day hold their own in every particular with those that are now roosting in Abraham's bosom.

I suppose all these gentlemen who travel in the narrow way will now boycott all broad-gauge railroads, all manufacturers of clocks that run more than six days in the week, all manufacturers of yeast that will rise on Sunday, all magistrates who perform the marriage ceremony upon that day, all priests who do the same, except under certain circumstances and conditions mentioned in 1 Cor. vii, 9. If these reverend sheiks who are holding religious services every Sunday upon the grounds fail to convert the heathen representatives present and insure another "Pentecostal season" as recorded in Acts ii, they will probably order the president to turn the troops upon them with orders to "slay old and young, male and female, infant and suckling, leave nothing alive that breathes," as recorded in Num. xxxi. Our British cousins, who also are Christians, may recommend the Sepoy route as preferable, load the big Krupp gun with them, and send them lakeward, "baptizing them into death," then sing the Doxology—"Praise God from whom all blessings flow." There is not the slightest doubt that these ranters have got religion in its full strength of the Cook, Crafts, Sam Jones, and Sam Small variety, got it bad too—unless they are what the little boy said his parents were. A Sunday-school agent asked him if his parents were Christians. His reply was, "Not much; my parents are Democrats. They have not caught it yet; when they do they will make things hum, you bet." We suppose the ransomed of the Lord will now proceed to sing:

Oh, how happy are they
Who their savior obey,
Who can ride on half-pay
On God's holy day.

We can ride on free passes,
Although we are called asses
By great and small classes
Which make the great masses.

It was expected that all members of the Young Men's Christian Association would wear crape upon their hats; the Christian Endeavor Societies would do the same; the Woman's Christian Temperance Union suitably adorn the back furrows upon their shoulders; all Christian newspapers ornament their columns with black lines, etc.; but I will not further trespass upon your patience. With best wishes,

I remain, yours respectfully,
JAS. P. DICKINSON.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

His Brother.

A traveler up the mountain side,
Through cloud and gathering mist,
A dark, forbidding object spied—
"What's this?" he said, "I list.
I almost hear his frightful howl—
Shall I go on or wait?
This beast, now bent on mischief foul,
May kill me in his hate."

Still nearer came the dreaded thing,
Its shape more like a man,
Perhaps some stranger come to bring
Late tidings to his clan.

Still on the creature came. His face
Then most familiar seemed;
The traveler paused, and tender grace
Quick in his fond eyes gleamed;
His eager, hastening feet him led Close unto the other—
Clasped in his arms he, trembling, said,
"Lo! it is my brother!"

A Sermon to Young Men.

"The boy is father to the man," is a saying frequently heard, and the truth of it is often shown in the lives of men. Most of those who have attained eminence, and have been looked upon by the world with admiration, only became so by perseverance, study, and obedience when they were young, continued when they were men. It is when we are young that our hopes are brightest, our lives so full of sunshine, and that our future seems secure. It is only by acts of transgression that the bitterness of life is brought before us. It is by such acts that we are inclined to be pessimistic, and it is by an obstinate refusal to view things from their bright side that we remain so. Truly, then, every young man that wants success must have hopes, must have determination. He must view the failures that are to be met with in the beginning as stepping-stones to the bright future ahead. Experience—true experience—is dearly bought, and it is only by failures and experience that we become better adapted to fight this battle of life in the way we should.

Perhaps the first lesson to be learned is when we are babes—when we can just say, "Papa," "Mamma," and when our little feet are barely able to support us. That lesson is obedience. This is part of the secret of success. This is the stepping-stone to greater things. To know how important this lesson is, ask those that have failed in making life a success the cause of their failure. They will answer: "Disobedience." Still further will be shown the necessity of obedience. View the broken-down wretch—whether the prison is his home, the poor-house his last abode, or the highways and the low city resorts his places of refuge, you can hear the cry: "If I only obeyed when I was young, I would not now be as I am." Obedience is the first lesson of the child, of the citizen, of the soldier, of the statesman and monarch. It is a lesson that must be learned, or if not, the consequences that follow will be exceedingly severe.

Now, the next thing to learn is the difference between right and wrong. This lesson may be studied when the youthful mind has thrown off its babyish notions, and when you have emerged into that state known as "the schoolboy." It is now that you learn the rudiments of right and wrong, and as the mind expands, so will you be better able to grasp and comprehend. You now learn that theft, lying, murder, and such acts are wrong, and that truthfulness, honesty, and being honorable are right. Still, as you grow, you see why it is so. You see the cause and effect. And thus you are able to decide between right and wrong. So you grow into men; your judgment is supposed to be ripe, and you can enter into any intellectual battle, fitted to make a good fight, provided your knowledge is equal to it.

The word "knowledge," by the way, suggests education, for it is by education we acquire knowledge. Herbert Spencer says: "Remember that to educate rightly is not a simple and easy thing, but a complex and extremely difficult thing." Alas! how many young men and people well on in years think the contrary. "I will send my boy to school and college, and he will graduate and be educated," is frequently said. But how many are educated? is the question. Education rightly means to have a fit knowledge of the affairs of life, and no school or college is fitted to give that knowledge. Experience, again, must be the teacher; observation, the assistant; willingness, the pupil. A school or college education is only the rudiment of the greater education, and we must not ignore them at all. The few hours spent in them must be used to the best advantage.

Too much self-confidence is a danger which all young men are apt to fall into. They imagine at times they cannot do wrong, and that they are proof against the "frailties common to mankind." It is right to have confidence—it is necessary. It is right to think you have ability for doing this and that, but it is wrong to think you can do anything, as most do. Too much self-confidence, like pride, goeth before a fall, as many find to their sorrow.

Now comes the choosing of friends and companions. This is a difficult task, because there is so much fickleness and hypocrisy in human nature. Sincerity to one another is good, and so is truthfulness. A person having these virtues will make a good friend, and should be chosen in preference to one who lies, gambles, or does things similar, for such person could never be sincere or truthful. If you have among your friends any who are sincere in their friendly relations, you may be sure adversity will not frighten them away. Sincerity and truthfulness are the foundation of friendship.

The class of books you read should have attention. They help you to form opinions, and in a way educate. Bad books must surely degrade the mind, and such a mind is not of any use. Young men gain more useful and valuable knowledge in reading books on history, science, philosophy, and essays by such men as Bacon, Emerson, and Macaulay. Standard works by such authors as Dickens, Scott, Thackeray, etc., are interesting and help to pass away many an idle hour. Remember that good reading improves the mind, so beware of the books you read, and be judicious in your choice.

A lecturer once said: "Always have an object in view, and let your aim in life be elevated. Here young men are extremely apt to fail. They have no settled plan in life, no high-commanding purpose impelling a worthy action. The consequence is they are fickle of purpose, unsteady in conduct, open to the assaults of temptation, and are easily drawn into vicious courses." Think of it. Must you not be impressed with the importance of having an ambition to lead you on, of having something that must at times encourage you when you are about to weaken? It is the duty of young men to have an object in view; they must, if they want to succeed; and where can success be when you are living on in empty ambition?

"Be thyself" is another lesson to learn, for, if we are not ourselves, how can we expect to prosper and be honorable? It is an essentiality—something that every noble person is. It calls upon you to be other than an imitation, and surely no young man wants to be an imitator of another's character—a hypocrite. If you would do a thing, do it, if it is right, no matter if it displeases others who would have you do otherwise, that may be wrong. Be thyself, in all the affairs of life be thyself.

And now, in conclusion, it is said: Be kind, be generous, be sympathetic, for it is what the world needs. The many who have fallen, those who are falling, need your sympathy and encouragement. Little acts of kindness make many a place smooth, and it does no harm to do them. In this battle of life, young men, be good, obey, be truthful and honest, be thyself, and always have an object in view, and have courage. If you are so, when you "shuffle off this mortal coil" you may rest in quietness, and be at peace with the world, having done your duty and your best.

EDWARD DOBSON.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

A mother was calling the attention of her little boy to the moon, which was to be seen clearly, but pallidly, in the early afternoon. "Why, you can't see the moon in the daytime?" replied the youngster. "Oh, yes you can—there it is over the trees!" The little fellow looked, and had to admit the fact that he saw it, but he added: "Tain't lighted, anyhow."

A little five-year-old here was told by her mamma, a Baptist, that if she did not stop being naughty she would go to that wicked place where the fire burns continually. "And shall I burn up, mamma?" "No, you will burn and burn forever." "Well," said the child, "I guess I will wait until I feel it burn me; then I'll stop."—Onset correspondence Brockton Enterprise.

A little seven-year-old, whose philosophical mind was bent on allowing its little owner to stay up longer than usual, asked a question that could not be answered offhand. It was this: "Mamma, what would we have been if we hadn't been anybody?"

A VALUABLE SUGGESTION.

"Remember, boys," said the new teacher, "that in the bright lexicon of youth there's no such word as fail."

After a few moments of deep silence a red-headed boy from Boston raised his hand.

"Well, what is it, Socrates?" asked the teacher.

"I was merely going to suggest," replied the youngster, as he cleaned his spectacles with his handkerchief, "that if such is the case, it would be advisable to write to the publishers of the lexicon and call their attention to the omission."

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition
Winwood Reade's "Martyrdom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Men, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phoenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral. We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS)

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right. Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 30 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Li. tiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abs. on; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Lignori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

SERMONS OF RELIGION AND LIFE. By Henry Doty Maxson. Chicago: Chas. H. Kerr & Co. Cloth, pp. 334, price $1.

This is a selection from the sermons of a Unitarian minister. It is published by the Unitarian Society of Menomonie, Wis. A biographical sketch opens the book. Then come sermons entitled Religious Possibilities of Agnosticism, Am I My Brother's Keeper? Sympathy, Which Is Catching—Health or Disease? Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde: a Study in Dualism, Faith, Shall We Preach the Whole Truth to the People? Who Are the Atheists? Do Unitarians Believe the Bible? What Do Unitarians Believe? Jesus. The True Individualism, Immortality. Losing One's Soul, How Much Does He Get?

In the first article, "Religious Possibilities of Agnosticism," the author first sees to it that the reader gets a good notion of what Agnosticism is. He quotes Huxley's narration of how he came to invent the word "Agnostic," containing his phrase, "The chief thing that I was sure of was that I did not know a great many things that the -ists and the -ites about me professed to be familiar with." The author next tells that the word has taken on a more specific philosophic sense as descriptive of the view of Mr. Herbert Spencer, who insists that all the three theories respecting the origin of the universe—self-existence, self-creation, and creation by an external power, or in other words the Atheistic, the Pantheistic, and the Theistic—are ultimately unthinkable; but that they all, nevertheless, instead of being purely erroneous, contain a fundamental verity; that, pursued to their last analysis, they all alike lead the inquirer into the presence of an infinit, eternal mystery, ever pressing for solution, but ever insoluble. To this Spencer applies the term, "The Unknowable." This unknowable that surrounds us will, the author thinks, always excite those feelings of mystery and awe which largely constitute religion. The more we know, the more we find there is still unknown. In the words of the writer, "If you thrust out into space the expanding circle of knowledge, by so much as you increase the area of that circle, you lengthen the circumference which marks off the endless realm of the unknown still awaiting solution." Indeed, when investigation and analysis have done their utmost, the human soul, in the very nature of the case, must ever find itself in the awe-inspiring presence of an impenetrable mystery. The soul itself is mysterious. That anything exists is mysterious. All is mysterious.

But, says Mr. Maxson, we are met by a difficulty if we assert that this unknowable should be regarded with love or worship. "I stand awe-struck," says he, "in the midst of a gorgeous June day, whose warmth and light are not only filling my soul with cheer, but, in ways whose mysteriousness baffles my understanding, are quickening into fresh activity and crowning with renewed promise all the channels of life that are flowing on around me. But, on the other hand, I stand awe-struck in the midst of the shafts of lightning that are working havoc on every hand and threatening myself and those I hold most dear with imminent death. So if there lies at the center of the universe an impenetrable mystery, although it may inspire me with awe, there is no more reason, it may be said, for contemplating it with love than with loathing, with trust than with fear; and therefore why may it not be the part of wisdom, as far as in me lies, to shut it out from my soul and exercise my emotions solely on the known and the knowable, which will be of use to me?" To this objection against loving and worshipping the great mystery of the universe, Mr. Maxson admits he can furnish no reply wholly satisfactory. He allows that whether the religion of the unknowable is to be productive of a pleasurable or a painful sense of mystery will depend upon whether one's view of life savors of optimism or pessimism, whether his temperament and environment chance to conduce to well or ill being. However, for his own part, he nourishes the opinion that there is ground for affectionate feelings toward the world-mystery that operates our lives. He says: "The Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed inspires me with an awful sense of mystery. But, as I examine the stream of things which comes within the range of knowledge, I find, or seem to find, that, notwithstanding frequent failures and relapses and occasions for temporary discouragement, a wider view discloses the fact of a marked progress in the world of life, a marked advance in the evolution of human character. And so though I recognize the infinit significance of life as beyond the compass of my finite comprehension, still I am reassured with the conviction that there is an eternal purpose of good running through all things. And so, grounded on the Inscrutable Mystery, I not only fall on my face in reverent awe; I cheerfully surrender myself in hopeful trust."

The reader will see from this résumé of the first article in Mr. Maxson's volume, the viewpoint and tone of the writer as they appear in the following essays. He will see that the author is a man of cautious thought, who after presenting the Infidel or Atheistic views in their full strength and with perfect fairness, in the end modestly insinuates some of those considerations in favor of Theism and devotionism which constitute him a Unitarian and enable him to conduct worship. We think that the book would make interesting and instructive reading for a Freethinker.

HORE SABBATICAE; or, An Attempt to Correct Certain Superstitious and Vulgar Errors Respecting the Sabbath. By Godfrey Higgins, F.S.A., F.R. Asiatic Soc., F.R. Ast. S., author of "Anacalypsis, or an Inquiry into the Origin of Languages, Nations, and Religions." New York: Peter Eckler. Octavo, pp. 81, cloth 50 cents, paper 25 cents.

The facts in regard to Sunday ought to be known. All institutions now observed by human beings may claim a human origin, but many pious people believe differently, and claim in addition to human laws divine authority for the religious observance of Sunday. But their notions in regard to this subject are confused and ill-defined, and will not bear the test of examination. They believe the Bible to be the inspired word of God, that Jesus Christ was the only-begotten son of God, and also God himself, but when the son of Mary defends his disciples for violating Jewish Sabbath laws by plucking corn on the Sabbath day (as recorded in Mark ii, 23-28), and tells the Pharisees that "the Sabbath was made for man and not man for the Sabbath," and that "the son of man is Lord also of the Sabbath," our modern Sabbatarians, although they assert that "Jesus spoke as one having authority," yet seem to have no sympathy with his liberal views, and, by striving to enforce the Puritanical Sunday laws of modern bigotry, they, in effect, like the ancient Pharisees, oppose the teachings of their "savior," and repudiate the authority of the God they pretend to worship. Because the Jews were commanded in the Bible to "Remember [Saturday] the Sabbath day, to keep it holy," certain pharisaical sectarians decided to remember the sun day, the venerable day of the sun, and keep it holy in like manner, without any biblical command for so doing. The Bible student will seek in vain throughout its pages for any reference to Sunday observance, as there is no authority whatever in either the Old or New Testament for keeping holy the day which the idolatrous pagans formerly dedicated to the sun. Christ and his disciples never proposed so radical an innovation. St. Paul and the evangelists never advocated such a change. The Apostles were Jews by birth, education, and faith. They were strict observers of Jewish laws and customs, and it was while celebrating the Jewish feast of the Passover at Jerusalem that Jesus was betrayed by Judas, and arrested, tried, convicted, and crucified by Pilate. The first Christian emperor, the wicked Constantine, who imagined that his stalwart form, impressive features, august and commanding presence gave him a resemblance to the Grecian Helios or Roman Apollo—the fabled god of the sun—was a strong advocate for the change from the Jewish sacred Saturday to the equally sacred pagan Sunday, or the day in med for and dedicated to the solar luminary. Accordingly, the change was made. Thus it was made without divine authority of any sort. So the Christians now disobey the commands to observe Saturday that were given, their Bible states, by God; and obey the commands to observe Sunday that were given by mere men. Could they be made aware of the want of foundation for their observance of Sunday, they would relax in their enforcement of it. We continually counsel our subscribers to post themselves on the subject and teach these Christians the truth. We have already been proffering our readers several good books for the purpose, and this one contains even things that are not in the others, and is of unchallengeable correctness in its historical affirmations. We commend it highly, and should be glad to see a copy of it in the hand of every Freethinker in the land.

Ex-Senator Warren Smith, of Nashville, Tenn., produces as his latest work a 10-cent pamphlet, "Theism or Law—Which?" Glancing over its chapter-titles, we find that first the Christian is flatly told, "The God Idea Is of Human Origin." The Christian is next stigmatized as that unpleasant character, the borrower, for, declares the next heading, "The Christian's God Is Borrowed." "The Character of the Christian's God" is the title of a section which we suppose will make the devout start wildly in his seat with mutterings in which the words libel and blasphemy laws may be discerned. "God Swears in His Wrath," is the next heading, which, we should think, might suggest the employment of the statutes in another way. That "God Orders and Accepts Human Sacrifices," as we are next told, will perchance do the mission cause some good in Africa's anthropophagous wilds. The "Results of These Examples," following next, we will leave to shock Christians into something resembling common sense, passing on to perceive how "The Lord Is Guilty of Outrage, Injustice, and Vanity," "Is Warlike and Vengeful," "Is Partial," and "Is Guilty of Falsehood and Deception." That "God Violates His Oath and Breaks His Promise" is succeeding information that will surprise Christians, who never were known to do so themselves. "God's Personal Appearance" is next commented on, without, we fear, that delicacy in treating such matters which is recommended by modern manuals of etiquette. Even "His Dwelling-Place" is not spared remark. "Personality and Infinity Are Contradictory," verily, so does ourself believe. "The Chief End of Man" will scarcely turn out to be, in the opinion of this writer, to glorify God. "Responsibility to God," too, is a thing of which Mr. Smith says something, but, we would wager, feels nothing. "Creators Are Responsible to Creatures" is a declaration that will swell the Christian notion of "the colossal arrogance of Infidels" to huger proportions yet. "The Facts" is a heading which we suppose will scare Christian eyes away. That "Perpetual Vigilance Is Imperatively Necessary" is the truthful statement with which the ex-Senator closes his useful book.

"The prophet Jonas is said by holy writ to have remained in the bowels of the whale for several days, at the expiration of which the cetacean, who seemed to be possessed of friendly sentiments toward the prognosticator of the fate of Nineveh, gently evacuated him into the Mediterranean sea, where, it would appear, he was picked up by a passing vessel. Jonas would seem, if reliance is to be placed in biblical records, to have exercised considerable influence over the vegetable as well as the piscatorial kingdoms, and we may be certain that a gold medal, at least, would have been awarded to him at any agricultural exhibition for the marvelous vine from underneath the shade of which he uttered his celebrated imprecations on the city of which the inhabitants had, for reasons unexplained but doubtless cogent, refused him audience. The fact that the prophet may have proved an indigestible item in the whale's menu is not mentioned by the anonymous biographer of the amiable gentleman. Nowadays fishes seem to be more voracious and less polite, at any rate toward gentlemen engaged in ecclesiastical mission, as is proved by a recent tragical event off the coast of Santa Cruz in this colony."

The author of the foregoing, who thinks that the whale possessed "friendly sentiments" toward Jonah, deems that said prophet should have a medal, adds that after all he was so tough with bigotry and sanctimonious dryness as to be indigestible, and deplores the late decline in politeness of fishes as evinced in their conduct toward an ecclesiastical gentleman off the neighboring coast—the author of all this is a journal named Progress, the first two numbers of which have just reached us from Port-of-Spain, Trinidad, West Indies. It is, its pretty yellow cover-page proclaims, "a monthly journal of advanced thought." That it is indeed a periodical of advanced thought is evidenced by the Port-of-Spain Gazette, a journal run in the spirit of the populace of that church-swayed neighborhood. This Gazette says of Progress that "its existence is an insult to a Christian community." Nothing more in favor of this bright new Freethought monthly need be added.

"I have spent a good part of fifty-one years of my life in reading and thinking about religions, especially the Jewish and Christian; and, believing that I am now at the meridian of my competency to judge of their merits, and that from this, in the natural order of life, I must soon begin my descent, I want to gratify a long-cherished hope of transmitting to posterity, as well as promulgating while I live, my conclusions upon this subject. Regarding my competency, my readers can best judge as we progress, though I will say that I was ordained to the Christian ministry after having taken my degree in an average Western college, and then having studied the books that are specially used in training young men for the pulpit; and that for a few years after I became of age I preached, with what, I then and now think, was an average acceptability. I left the pulpit at the height of my greatest prosperity and popularity, and when it gave me great trouble to do so, because I became skeptical as to the miraculous claims of the Christian religion." The foregoing is the way in which Charles C. Moore, of Louisville, Ky., opens his work entitled "The Rational View." He goes over all the arguments most useful to the Infidel in warfare against the scriptures. He considers the origin of the earth and man, design, evolution, the existence of a God, the history of the Jews, the authenticity of the Old Testament, the character of Jesus, the credibility of the narrative of the New Testament, and many other like topics. In style the book is plain, in statement nearly always accurate, and in judgment usually wise. It contains 373 pages, is bound in cloth, and sells for $1.

We are pleased to receive a volume bearing the title: "Seventh Annual Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1891. Cost of Production: the Textiles and Glass. Vol. I." The book is got out by that well-known publishing firm, the United States government. That this house enjoys a first-class reputation in the publishing line, we will not affirm. Its managers are far from what could be wished in the choice of matter for publication. Most of their volumes, it appears, are so dull and worthless that they are not read. But we are not without esteem for some of the points of the concern, despite its so numerous faults, and we wish that it may have all the success that it will try to deserve.

Montague Levenson has written out his "Thoughts on Institutions of the Higher Education." These thoughts are, that the classics in our colleges should be supplanted by science, as they waste the students' time and degrade their morals; that among the sciences, that of government and political economy should be taught especially; and that drunkenness and gambling among the students should be suppressed. These thoughts, which very much resemble our own, are elaborated with wealth of illustration and quotation in 114 pages, which may be had in cloth binding for $1 and in paper for 50 cents.

The 10-cent pamphlet, "Is Roman Catholicism a Menace to American Institutions?" by Sister Agatha, touches on the chief grounds of our hostility to Rome, viz. that institution's setting duty to religion above duty to the state, its enmity of the schools, its falsification of the history and all books that its pupils and students study, its contravention of civil law, its plundering of public coffers, its persecution of the speakers of truth about it, its systems of celibacy and the confessional, and so on. Jordan Bros., Philadelphia, are the publishers.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

THE Vienna Fashion Club has sent a circular to all the tailors in Austria, calling upon them to promote the colored dress coat as being in the interest of good taste. Not bright colors, but blue, brown, drab, and green, are recommended.

It is said that China is waiting to see whether the Geary law will be enforced here. If it is, she will at once expel all Americans in her dominions. She has them all enrolled, and can expel them more easily than we can her subjects.

JUDGE EWING has declined to endeavor to set aside Judge Goggin's order continuing the World's Fair Sunday-opening case sixty days. Attorney Edwin Walker for the directors, however, will try to obtain a decision and appeal, so as to close the gates.

HAMILTON FISH, ex-secretary of state, died on the 7th. His most meritorious work was procuring the settlement by the Geneva Tribunal of Arbitration of the claims against Great Britain growing out of the depredations of Confederate cruisers fitted out in British ports, and commonly known as the Alabama claims.

An investigation into nepotism in the national Senate reveals that nearly every Senator who is chairman of a committee gives the clerkship to his son or nephew, and that nearly all the clerks, assistant-clerks, messengers, and others who are engaged in the service of the Senate are related by blood to some Senator.

REV. DR. STOECKER, a leader of the persecutions against the Jews in Germany, has arrived in response to the invitation of Mr. Moody to take part in the Congress of Religions. Stoecker is being severely criticised. Professor Bamberger says: "To call here a man who preaches intolerance and hatred against fellow-citizens, is nothing more or less than treason."

A CHARWOMAN employed in the British Parliament house has died of cholera. England is alarmed. The disease is causing deaths in Italy, Austria, and Germany. The Rhine has been declared infected, and bathing in it has been forbidden. Hundreds of Mecca pilgrims have died about Suez, Egypt, and given the plague to others. The epidemic is raging in Russia.

UNDER the decision of Judge Ross, of Los Angeles, Cal., warrants for the arrest of six Chinamen under the registration clause of the Geary act have been issued. The Chauanga Farmers' Association has determined to arrest every Chinaman in the Chauanga valley. The council of labor will swear out two hundred warrants on the result of the trial of the six Chinamen.

NEWSPAPER veracity is reflected on by a late utterance of President Cleveland. Don M. Dickinson, who was postmaster under Cleveland's first administration, says: "I saw Mr. Cleveland yesterday, and we had a long chat. He told me the newspapers had said scarcely anything true about his movements for the last six months. 'When I have been at home they have had me fishing; when I've been fishing they have had me at home.' These were the president's words to me."

A DANGEROUS ROAD.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professed naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers:

"Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore. Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignment ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Rensburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Rensburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battle-dore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Rensburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

PICTURES OF ALL THE PRINCIPAL BUILDINGS:

Woman's Building.	Art Palace.	Fisheries Building.
Administration Building.	Manufactures and Liberal Arts Building.	Agricultural Building.
Electrical Building.	Mines and Mining Building.	Transportation Building.
Machinery Hall.	Forestry Building.	Horticultural Building.

A visitor to the Fair says of this book—reading it in THE TRUTH SEEKER—that it is charming and to one who has seen the Fair vastly entertaining.

The Moral Responsibility of Woman in Heredity.
Woman as an Annex.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on the Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pinneries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

What We Pay to Support the Church.

When we are given definit knowledge of the exact amount of taxes shirked by the churches, we are more impressed than by the merely indefinit knowledge thereon that we ordinarily possess. The Globe Democrat, of St. Louis, has been to the pains of collecting the particulars of all the tax-exemptions in that city; and among these exemptions that of the churches stands out most markedly; and it makes a weighty impression on our mind. We do not mean, exemption of the churches alone, but of other ecclesiastical institutions and properties—associations, academies, convents, cemeteries, and the Lord knows how many more sorts. The Roman Catholic churches form a long string. They receive from the Agnostics, Infidels, Jews, and all the others who make up the body politic, a gift of the taxes that should be levied on $2,934,600 worth of churches and parochial schools. The Presbyterian churches make a good second in the struggle to avoid paying one's honest dues. They dodge payment of the taxes on $589,220 worth of edifices which the city departments are nevertheless expected to provide with water, protection from fire, policing, indemnity in case of riot, paved streets leading thereto, and so on. The Episcopalians next file forward and claim that they should be allowed to be dishonest to the extent of the taxes on $379,539. The German Evangelical Lutheran churchmen then push to the front, pounce on and pocket the assessments on $323,630, and retire to their pulpits to declare that Christianity elevates morals. The job, or deal, which the Baptists operate against the city treasury is one of the extent of the taxes on $305,340. The Methodist Episcopal church South evidently feels that the populace should do something in reparation for the taking away of the slaves which its clergy and wealthy supporters once enjoyed, for it demands annually the taxes on $301,860. For St. Louis's non-church-goers, unbelievers, and so on, to pay their hard-earned dollars to buy Congregational sermonizings and psalm-singsings, seems odd, but nevertheless they do so yearly to the amount of the taxes on $272,330. The purchase by the same people of Methodist Episcopal rignarole and prevarication, seems as queer, and suggests that there is a violation of the freedom of contract supposed to obtain in this land, but the buying goes on year after year in the sum of taxes on $237,220. Other denominations filch tax-money on the following amounts: German Evangelical, $219,680; Hebrew, $217,400; Unitarian, $106,240; Christian, $52,000; Presbyterian Cumberland, $41,880; Presbyterian United, $40,780; English Evangelical Lutheran, $40,380; German Lutheran, $40,200; New Jerusalem, $39,940; miscellaneous, $227,650.

Besides these, the Christians have a deal more of property on which, by their intrigues with the public officers, they contrive to escape taxes. There are hospitals in which the inmates are by daily ceremonies inducted into sectarian beliefs, though we who pay their taxes decidedly do not want any such beliefs propagated by our money. There are asylums to which politicians give not only taxes but large bonuses of our money, and in which youth are bred in doctrines inexpressibly repellent to our sentiments. There are schools and academies which we must daily see before us imbuing the young with the creeds of religion, while we know that an establishment of ours for imparting to them the principles of irreligion or Freethought would be required to pay its every cent. There is the Young Men's Christian Association. And finally there are cemeteries, business concerns operated by the churches at a goodly profit. Out of these classes of exempt property, we will make room for a detailed statement of those of convents and cemeteries:

CONVENTS.
Carondelet.....	$6 750
Convent of the Good Shepherd.....	134 890
Convent of the Sacred Heart.....	205 850
Convent of the Visitation.....	278 620

St. De Charetal Academy of the Visitation.....	27 800
St. Joseph Convent of Mercy.....	39 540
St. Vincent (German).....	62 850
Sisters of Loretto.....	35 900
Sisters of St. Joseph.....	72 700
Ursuline Convent and Academy.....	53 800
Total.....	$950 660
CEMETERIES.
Bellefontaine Cemetery.....	$213 500
Bethlehem Congregational Cemetery.....	1 200
Calvary Cemetery.....	142 000
Cemetery Catholic.....	23 600
Evangelical German Cemetery.....	6 270
Evangelical Lutheran Congregational Cemetery.....	4 160
First Evangelical Lutheran Cemetery Society... Holy Ghost.....	4 500
German Evangelical Lutheran Cemetery of the Holy Ghost.....	39 140
German Evangelical Protestant Cemetery.....	23 790
Independent Evangelical Protestant Church Cemetery.....	6 870
Missouri Crematory Association.....	5 780
New Bremen Cemetery.....	6 140
St. Matthew's Cemetery Association.....	2 510
St. Paul's Church Cemetery.....	2 610
SS. Peter and Paul's Cemetery.....	5 720
Western Evangelical Lutheran Cemetery.....	7 360
Total.....	$495 150

The total value of the church property exempt is $10,507,550. This is over one-fourth of all the property exempt in the city, as the total, reckoning in the city hall, city hospitals, court house, fire department buildings, city asylums, markets, police department buildings, poorhouse, workhouse, water-works, and public parks, with state and national properties, is $38,621,750.

The exemption of church property is a monstrous curse. It is so efficacious a help in the accumulation of property, that by its means the church has sometimes obtained a third of the wealth of a nation. When it did this, in the European countries of a few generations ago, it was enabled by this opulence to exert a tremendous power in keeping the people in servitude. By this instrumentality of tax-exemption it will be enabled to secure a like proportion of the wealth of the United States if some future conjunction of events shall chance to revive its popularity. As it is at present, the exemption is a prodigious robbery, a glaring violation of the American principle of equal opportunities and no privileges, and a perilous tie of connection between church and state.

Scientists Are As Happy As Pietists.

It is said by some that Freethinkers must naturally be less happy than Christians because the scientific way of looking at the world offers no food for the heart. Science, it is said, is cold and hard. The exercise of the intellectual faculties, it is alleged, in the investigations, discoveries, comparisons, analyses, classifications, and determinations of science, cannot gratify the nature of man like the emotions of trust, adoration, faithfulness, and communion with divinity, which are developed by religion. But the persons who say these things make the mistake of supposing that human nature always remains the same. It does not. The nature of man, and of every other form of living being, changes with change of environment. It varies to meet the varying demands upon it. Evolution shows that with the change of the conditions of humanity or any other species of organism, there follows a readjustment of constitution to the new conditions. Whatever is found necessary or beneficial to the continuance of life, appears as the need for it appears. The pickman's palm grows horny, and the blacksmith's arm strong, as the requirements on them comes; and in like manner as men are more and more forced to intellectual activities as requisit to winning in the struggle for existence, so do there more and more appear pleasures accompanying those activities and prompting to their exercise. An African finds the attempt to comprehend a slight abstraction, to conduct a considerable mental operation of any kind, repugnant and painful. But the intellectual members of the Caucasian race—and they are increasing in number every day—turn to such activities as their chief delight. The pleasures of barbarous man have consisted in great part of the exercise of the emotions of wonder, awe, and, in particular, the emotion of satisfaction felt at supposed love and protection by an imagined personality beyond the skies. But there is now growing among advanced mankind the set of emotions making it a pleasure to know, and to do. The Christian repugnance to the scientific view of the world and scientific relations with it, amounts only to an example of the rule that all readjustment of human conditions involves a corresponding readjustment of emotions, and such a change is always felt as a deprivation by those partial to the old set of emotions, and is by them denounced as such.

Christ as Distiller and Tippler.

Among all the plain cases of immorality being sanctioned by the Christian religion, there is none plainer than that of liquor-drinking being commended by that system. Yet despite this plainness, so bemisted and beclouded are the majority of the people in the thick fog that outbreathes from the pulpit, that they believe Christianity to be a foe to the use of liquor. The church has taken up the cause of temperance lately, as it often does any reform when the movement has been started and pushed into popularity by others, and the church thinks that it is going to succeed; and this makes many suppose that Christianity is by nature a signal enemy of intemperance. It is not, however. The temperance movement is favored by church people solely by reason of the human, moral elements of their natures, not because of their supernatural imbue ment; and the Bible itself pronounces for liquor-drinking in terms unmistakable. We have ever and anon held up to public view this sanction of drink by the scripture. Now we are helped in the good work by the New York Sun, a paper which is continually seizing on some truth that is being obscured by popular error and raising and displaying it aloft in convincing clearness to the eye of the multitude. This Sun has received a letter running thus:

"In your editorial under the head of 'A Question Christians Cannot Debate,' you aver that Christians with the example of Jesus before them, cannot consistently condemn the use of intoxicating drinks as a beverage; also that Christ himself was a drinker of wine. Will you kindly tell me how you make out the above, and where in the Bible it says that Christ indulged in intoxicating drinks?
W. L. B."

To this inquirer the Sun replies that in Luke vii, 33, 34, it is written:

"For John the Baptist came neither eating bread nor drinking wine; and ye say, He hath a devil. The son of man is come eating and drinking; and ye say, Behold a gluttonous man, and a winebibber, a friend of publicans and sinners!"

Furthermore, this journal pursues, "when they wanted wine" at the "marriage in Cana of Galilee," as John ii records, "the mother of Jesus saith unto them, They have no wine." Then occurred this event:

"Jesus saith unto them, fill the water pots with water. And they filled them up to the brim. And he saith unto them, draw out now, and bear unto the governor of the feast. And they bear it. When the ruler of the feast had tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was (but the servants which drew the water knew), the governor of the feast called the bridegroom, and saith unto him, every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine, and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now."

It appears, therefore, goes on our reply, that Jesus not only furnished a miraculous supply of wine, but that he produced it after the guests had already "well drunk;" and among those guests, as the evangelist records, were both Jesus and his disciples, the obvious inference being that he partook of the beverage along with the others. He would not have made this "beginning of miracles" by changing water into wine if he had objected to the use of wine even in considerable quantities.

Another instance is given by Matthew. He relates that at the institution of the holy supper, Jesus "took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine until that day when I drink it new with you in my father's kingdom."

It is to be noticed, too, that St. Paul counsels Timothy to "drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities."

Our journalistic collaborer in the work of exposing Bible faults despite ministerial lies, goes back to Old Testament times and shows that wine was there described as a blessing, and employed for sacred purposes. It was poured out as a drink offering to God. It is said of it that it "maketh glad the heart of man" and "cheereth both God and man."

Our contemporary then closes its plain talk to its correspondent in the following words. As the contrasting point of the Mohammedan religion, that it forbids liquor-drinking, was mentioned in the Sun's original article, we find it again touched on here:

"Our New Jersey friend must see, then, that Christians, under the law of their religion and the precept and example of Jesus, have no ground for debating whether the use of intoxicating beverages is sinful. Neither is there any reason for such debate among Mohammedans, for in express terms the drinking of those beverages is forbidden to them as a sin."

Is it not plain to every Christian after reading the foregoing that his religion does not discourage but does encourage the use of alcoholic beverages? Is there one Christian into whose hands this paper will fall so hardy that he will stand forth and allege that Christianity is not far inferior to Mohammedanism in the repression of intemperance?

Freethought Assembles a Parliament of Religions.

The way in which the firmest faith can be produced in a Christian believer, is to keep him ignorant that there are any men on earth who reject the evidence for his religion. A child, to whose eyes everyone about him appears a Christian believer, and whose parents speak of Christian doctrines as things of which doubt is out of the question, is the most thorough believer possible. When he grows older and learns that great bodies of human beings in other regions of the earth reject the Christian claims, his assurance of the truth of his faith is, imperceptibly to himself, somewhat lessened. If then his mind throughout his further life is little directed toward those people who repel Christianity, if he never obtains a very realistic conception of their numbers and their weight in judgment, his faith may suffer little more diminution. But if he reads much of these non-Christian peoples, and their numbers and importance begin to figure in his imagination as they deserve, he gradually grows to feel much less certain of his own creed. Journeying to the lands of these people, and mingling with them, produces a still stronger effect. Travelers are a class extremely given to unbelief. In short, a person largely governs his opinions by the rule, what everybody believes must be true; and his doubt of Christianity grows just as he gets to understand that everybody does not believe it, or gets an impressiv conception of those persons who do not, by whatever means he may get this.

By a bit of carelessness and inadvertence, the Christian ecclesiastics have done just this thing of which we have been speaking—directed attention to the fact that other peoples reject Christianity, and that these peoples are many and mighty. They have assembled at the Columbian Exposition a World's Parliament of Religions. The effect cannot but be prejudicial to their own cause. The attitude which they should take, to operate most favorably on their following, is one like that of olden time—scorn of all who believe otherwise than in Christ as unworthy to touch the hem of a Christian garment, and persecution and warfare upon them. They should, to win success with the masses, continue to insist on their religion as being self-evident, a thing the truth of which none but the veriest blind could fail to see, and to reject which argues a soul infatuated of crime and vice and all wrong, or possessed by the evil one. When, on the other hand, the Christian clergy allow themselves to be seen by their disciples willing to enter an assemblage of other ecclesiastics on a level with them, paying to the others as much consideration as is shown themselves, and presenting declarations and evidences of their religion in the same fashion and style as the others, the special distinction heretofore enjoyed by them in the minds of those disciples is sure to be lost.

The Christians have always alleged that a revelation has been made by divinity to mankind. A minute's consideration of the meaning of the word revelation, and then a noting of the huge numbers of people represented in the Parliament who do not believe Christianity, should convince anyone that no revelation has been made. A revelation means a revealing of something, a showing, a making evident or clear. Now, that Christianity has not been revealed, shown, or made evident or clear, to mankind, the presence of all these men declaring that it has not been made so to them abundantly testifies. So testifies, too, the number of sects present into which Christianity is divided. If that religion had really been revealed, there would not be five hundred different opinions on it. The diversity, the wandering and contradictory variety, of religious beliefs, shows plainly that they proceed not from one revelation made by one god to one set of men, but from the separate guesses of the multitude of separate human minds.

The fact that Christians have by the holding of this Parliament so departed from their former arrogance, self-sufficiency, and intolerance, which we said they should to serve their own interests have maintained, evinces a shifting of the spirit of the age from religion to science. Religion, held in firm belief, is invariably bigoted and intolerant, while science proceeds by the opposite methods of broadness, all-tolerance and all-inclusion. An admittance of all applicants to fair and equal hearing, an impartial scrutiny of all evidence submitted, such as is the rule in this religious congress, is opposite to the spirit of religion and the whole of its past course of conduct. On the other hand, it is of the inmost nature of science. It is the very method that science adopts in its proceedings. A congress of scientific men gathered to investigate religion could have adopted no more characteristic course. It is the method which Herbert Spencer has employed in his sociological constructions, theological as well as other, only that scientist used the printed reports of travelers instead of the spoken reports of delegates.

Another striking feature of this congress is its absence of strife. That bitterness of feeling which a short time ago would have prevented its very assembling has not shown itself. This is unexpected. It is at variance with the relations that have up to the present prevailed between the various religions. It moves the New York Herald to remark:

"This exhibit of peace on earth and good will to men is the one transcendent incident of the World's Fair. We can almost hear the echo of millennial bells piercing the air above the hilltops, and are warranted in making a prediction that controversy will soon give way to charity and the bitterness of sectarian strife to the realization of practical religion. Cardinal Gibbons and a Jewish rabbi on the same platform! A Presbyterian and a Brahmin and a Mohammedan and a disciple of Confucius following each other in eloquent words of greeting and welcome! Such a spectacle was unknown in the ages of the past and has until this moment seemed an impossibility. If the great Fair were a failure in everything else, it would be memorable for this noble achievement. The idea was a novel one, and the man who suggested it must have regarded it as an experiment likely to be attended with grave danger. Its success, however, is a wonderful tribute to the common sense, the love of fair play, and the profound reverence for what is good and true and inspiring in the heart of this nineteenth century. Look back to the days of our grandfathers, or even to those of our fathers, and note the miraculous change that has taken place. Such an enterprise as this Parliament of religions would have been scouted by them with immeasurable contempt, or roundly denounced as Antichrist. The world was divided into warring sects, and the more loyal they were to their peculiar forms of worship, the more violent were their attacks on their neighbors and rivals. The man on the next corner was a deluder and ensnarer of souls, and no thunderbolt of rhetoric or logic was too heavy to hurl at him. The Baptist, who believed in immersion, might perhaps admit that the Congregationalist, who only believed in sprinkling, would possibly get to heaven, but if he did it must be by a lucky chance and in spite of his error. The Catholic threw red-hot shot into the Protestant camp and the Protestant gave him a Roland for his Oliver by calling his church the 'Scarlet Lady' of scripture. The chief characteristic of differing pulpits was their unwillingness to touch the hem of each other's garments for fear of contagion, a harsh and violent repulsion, a series of coarse and in some instances brutal attacks on each other."

The sole thing that has brought about this change of feeling is Infidelity. When a person believes with his whole mind and heart that his religion is the only means of mankind's escape from an eternal hell, he will do anything in his power against those who refuse to embrace it; the only reason that one does not do so now is that, owing to Infidelity's having permeated everything with doubt, he does not believe with his whole mind and heart. Accordingly, then, "the one transcendent incident of the World's Fair," as the Herald calls it, the assembling of hitherto hostile persons on terms of peace, is the work of Infidelity. It is because of Infidelity that "we can" in that paper's words, "almost hear the echo of millennial bells above the hill-tops." Yes, "if the great Fair were a failure in everything else, it would be memorable for this noble achievement." Its success, says the Herald, is "a wonderful tribute to the common sense, the love of fair play, and the profound reverence for what is good and inspiring in the heart of this nineteenth century." And, be it marked, this nineteenth century is above all the age in which, as preachers lament, faith is declining and the world is becoming uppermost, the age in which Infidelity and science have reached their utmost pitch hitherto known.

We must give some account of the goings-on at the religious parliament. It was opened on the 11th by a procession. Jew marched with Gentile, and Catholic marched with Protestant. The religious beliefs of India, of China, and of Japan were represented, as well as those of the English-speaking nations. All, attired in their priestly robes and wearing the insignia of their office, marched in fellowship to the platform, while the audience rose and cheered at the sight.

On the succeeding day, the 12th, the more important meetings began to be held. These meetings, as well as those on following days, were very largely attended. It was necessary to hold overflow meetings in several halls. On the 12th, says one report, "For the first time from the same platform spoke a Jew, a Christian, and a Hindoo, each deeply in earnest; each logical and honest according to his light. For the first time a congregation of divided faiths listened with deepest interest to the presentation of views which a hundred years ago might have sent a heretic to the gallows. It was a consummate triumph of Liberalism; a study of comparative religions by a great university, which was ready to attack the subject without prejudice and in the pure light of reason." Yes, it was all of that. It was one of those noble and beneficent works with which Freethought is perpetually adorning and bettering the world.

To be sure, the value of the gathering did not lie in the worth of what the delegates said. It lay only in the fact that they had been made willing to come together, and say anything to one another as equals, at all. As for the intrinsic worth of their remarks, Freethinkers will readily imagine that it was scant. No wondrous sageness, for instance, will be imputed by Freethinkers to the address by the Very Rev. Augustine F. Hewitt, on "The Existence and Attributes of God," which, "amid a burst of applause," concluded thus:

"Matter and force are fixed quantities. Who fixed them? The matter in the stars and nebula never changes in quantity, and the force that drives them never varies. Who or what was their first motor? The mind demands this by a law of its original action, and the soul answers involuntarily, the supreme being that gave me my contingent being. The alternative is chance—an absurdity."

While the chairman of the day in opening pronounced this "the most momentous congress of the age," our readers will hardly deem very momentous the paper of the celebrated Rev. Alfred Momerie, of England. For that paper, on "The Philosophical and Moral Evidences of God," read, alas, thus. He said that the uniformity of nature, which had been claimed as an Atheistic argument, was really a first step toward the proof that there is a God. He held that the whole universe showed that there was one great purpose in the making of it. Science had proved not that there was a lack of purpose in the creation, but one great and intense purpose. There were many evidences of the world's relation to and dependence on mind. All showed the increasing activity of an infinit thinker. The most certain thing in science was evolution. That showed that the difficulties of civilization were being slowly but surely overcome. Infinit goodness and wisdom involved infinit restraint. There were restraints on the poet that were not on the prose-writer; there were restraints on a good man that were not on a bad, and there were restraints on a god that were not on a devil. He held that it was impossible for God to create a painless world. It seemed hard that a mother could not recall her child from death by prayer, but it would be harder for the world if she could. If we should know that the laws of nature had been broken only once, we should lose our faith and believe that we were living in a world of chance. It was because God was always with us that it sometimes seemed as if he could not be found.

No, not momentous in their revelatory wisdom were these remarks. Neither were the deliverances of the various Christian, Jewish, Mohammedan, and Buddhist speakers following.

Let us seek a grain of truth in the chaff-heap of the utterances of the following day, the 13th. We find it, luckily. It is in the speech of Right Rev. Bishop Shibata, of the Shinto sect, from Japan. It reads:

"Christianity was widely spread in Japan when, in 1837, the Christian missionaries, combined with their converts, caused a tragic and bloody rebellion against the country. It was understood at the time that these missionaries intended to subjugate Japan to their own country. It was this which caused the prohibition of Christianity in Japan. Christianity had brought riot, bloodshed, and rebellion in its train. Verily, it had brought instead of peace a sword. The government was forced to drive out the missionaries in self-defense."

Cries of "Shame! shame upon the missionaries!" arose on every side. Leaving the missionaries to the administration of shame, of which we think they can never get as much as they deserve, we will proceed to the next speaker. This was Mozoomdar, a Hindoo. He, says a report, "told a story that was touching in its delineation of the humanity of the noble faith and the gentle practices of the great sect to which he belongs." Certainly, his faith does possess considerable that is noble and many practices that are gentle—more than the religion of the cross. In succeeding addresses, representatives of many Oriental religions told things that the audience will be the better—the more broad-minded and liberal—for having heard. The newspaper reporter, catching the temporary fervor of generous tolerance, writes: "The truth and beauty which lie embodied in religions heretofore practically unknown to the mass of Christendom were laid bare to wondering and almost reverential eyes."

The congress would have been incomplete had it omitted, when there were so very many clergymen present, of all kinds, an example of that class of acts for which that profession has become so noted. What we mean will be seen when we relate that the Right Rev. Ruichi Shibata, of Japan, archbishop of the Shinto church, at the conclusion of his address "created a sensation by embracing three Caucasian ladies who were sitting upon the platform behind him. Upon the right cheek of each he imprinted the chaste kiss of religious brotherhood."

On the 14th some important speeches were made—important, that is, as the Christian public ranks things. Cardinal Gibbons presented a paper entitled, "The Needs of Humanity Supplied by the Catholic Church." The need of our readers for truth we fear we can but ill supply by passages from it, such as:

"We live and move and have our being in the midst of a civilization which is the legitimate offspring of the Catholic religion."

"The Catholic religion labors not only to assuage the physical distempers of humanity, but also to reclaim the victims of moral disease."

Rev. Lyman Abbott, the famous Brooklyn divine, and editor of the Christian Union, next favored the congress with sundry of those profound remarks in which theology is prolific.

Rev. Joseph Cook, of Boston, opened with the announcement, "The world expects of us this afternoon no drivel." But the world is old and has grown used to being disappointed in its expectations. Well it is that it is hardened against disappointment, for the best that it got in this case was such declarations as: "I hold that Christianity is the only religion that will harmonize the soul with its environments." We do not think that there was much harmony between the soul and its environments when Christianity was most believed—when men thought that their environment the earth was flat, that their environment the starry host revolved about the earth, that their environment of diseaseful influences was due to witches whom they must burn, and that their environment of religious dissenters was a manifestation of Satan which they must exterminate with the sword. That which the world expected to be "no drivel" was, too, in another part this: "Christianity only will deliver a man from the love of sin and the guilt of it." Whether it will deliver a man from the love of sin we will let the criminal statistics of Christian as contrasted with the unchristian ages tell. Deliver him from the guilt of it Christianity may; it is of all religions the one that has the best-developed system for freeing the ill-doer from guilt, as he regards it, upon payment of cash to the priest. Mr. Cook continued: "I appeal to the Bible as the ultimate authority for my belief. These cans and cannots of the Bible are the crags of certainty upon which I would plant the foundations of the universal religion." One of cannots of the Bible, as we remember it, is that a man cannot get good from the lips of a fool.

Next Dharmapala, the Buddhist priest and scholar of Calcutta, stood on the edge of the platform and fearlessly exposed Christian lies and rebuked Christian ignorance. He suddenly demanded: "How many of you have read the life of Buddha?" Five hands, four of them belonging to women, were timidly held up. "Five only," said the Buddhist, with a tone and look of disdain. "Four hundred and seventy-five millions of people accept our religion of love and hope. You call yourself a nation, a great nation, and yet you do not know the history of this great teacher. How dare you judge us?" The audience cheered. "You complain that you do not make converts among us," he continued. "You preach a God of love, but in your actions you are selfish. You make of an ignorant or an unsophisticated man a perfect hypocrite. You have used the story of a life-crushing bloody Juggernaut to secure the means to save alleged heathens. Juggernaut has been popularized by Christian missionaries, and yet a committee composed of eminent Englishmen has declared that the Christian idea of Juggernaut was a myth, that death and blood were repulsive to our people. This Christian story has been exploded. It has gone into oblivion." And so the Orientalist went on, scoring his hearers and defending his own creed. He asked how many had read the life of Mohammed, the prophet of Arabia, and when four hands went up he asked why they should denounce Mohammedanism when they knew nothing of it or its founder.

The Parliament of Religions contains much that is nonsensical and valueless, but it also brings to light a few truths. And it is noteworthy as being the first instance of Christian use of the scientific method. Hear all sides and then decide. This instance has been brought about by the operation of Freethought—Freethought the untiring benefactress and showerer of good gifts, under whose blessed sway the tiger and the lamb of varying sects shall lie down together, and the ravening beasts of religious persecution and warfare hush to unawaking sleep.

An Omaha policeman has been suspended for neglect of duty. His plea of excuse is, all will admit, the most extraordinary ever entered. He alleges that he entered a church and, becoming interested in the services, remained there too long. The journal that reports the case adds, "Never was policeman, probably, ever before suspended for neglect under such circumstances." Yes, marvelous it is! all-strange! all-wonderful!

The Freethinkers who have obtained the lead in governing Italy are leading the pope a sorry life. They have just got up what Catholics style "a scheme of the Piedmontese usurpation in Rome to forge new fetters for the sovereign pontiff." This is a regulation, proposed in the Italian parliament, that all documents issuing from the Vatican must have an exequatur, or official recognition before being allowed publication in Italy, or transmitted abroad. "This," says a Catholic journal, "is an old expedient to deprive of the right of free communication those who have received the divine commission to teach all nations."

Our readers remember the scheme for obtaining public money for Catholic schools that was introduced at Faribault, Minn. The Faribault plan, however, will soon be a thing of the past in that city. The Catholics, whose children attend the parochial school which was placed under the jurisdiction of the city board of education, now insist, in view of the coming term of school, that only Catholic teachers be engaged. The board of education is willing to have two Catholic teachers, but contends that if Catholic teachers only were engaged the school would become once more one for Catholic religious instruction, and the purpose of the Faribault plan as expounded by Archbishop Ireland would be lost. The Catholic prelates of the country are, however, determined by this scheme or some other to grasp part of the funds now used by the public schools. That they may not succeed, every endeavor of every lover of secularism is needed.

"The Rich Man Defended."

A FRIENDLY CHAT WITH BRAYTON AND REED.

I have written quite a little on land, financial, and tariff reforms, but those writings have been published in papers advocating such reforms and not offered to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I thought it better to keep that paper battling with the old superstition and striving to elevate men to a higher plane of morality than to divert it from its proper channel. But believing the articles of friends Reed and Brayton, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 2d, were calculated to lead men from the truth, I thought I might be allowed space in THE TRUTH SEEKER to give a reason for the faith that is in me.

Mr. Brayton says: "We see one man's right is as good to get and hold property as another's." Let us change the phraseology a little and say that one man's right to rob and plunder is as good as another's. What would friend Brayton say to that? When a half-dozen men can meet in the city of New York and stop the output of coal and throw thousands out of employment, and raise the price of coal from $6 to $10 per ton and freeze out thousands who are too poor to obtain it; when a Senator can touch a button and send oil up fifty per cent; when a few men can combine and make a corner on pork and wheat and send thousands of children to bed supperless, I think it about time for the American people to begin to question the right to "get and hold" property by such means.

"Then how can we blame the rich man for using his money as he thinks best?"

In 1873 Ernest Seyd came over from England with $500,000 and bought out the American Congress body and breeches and got silver demonetized, making the bonds payable in gold, thereby adding millions to their value, making every bond held in England worth ten per cent more, which difference the American people had to pay. Here is one instance at least in which we may justly blame a man for doing with his money "as he thinks best." Did space permit I could cite scores of cases of the same sort.

"He [the rich man] builds railroads and factories and employs thousands of poor people."

How did he come by his riches? Did not the poor man earn them before he could obtain them? Which was first, labor or capital? There could be no capital till labor produced it. Labor must produce the capital before the factory can be built. Then labor must not only earn money enough to pay itself, but generally earns enough besides to make the employer rich. Which is really the indebted party?

"And now there is a cry against the rich man for holding mortgages that cover almost all the Western farms."

Suppose a mortgage had been given when wheat was $2 per bushel, and the rich man, through his money, influences Congress to burn up the greenbacks and demonetize silver, and make money scarce, and thereby prices are sent down until wheat is only fifty cents a bushel; and now the mortgage comes due. How can a mortgage be paid which was based on wheat at $2 a bushel, with wheat at fifty cents? How can a debt of $2 be paid with fifty cents? Here is the clew to nine-tenths of the Western mortgages. It would seem that a man who would not cry out against such outrages must be either ignorant or heartless.

"If the laboring man cannot get work in one place he is free to go and work in another."

So, so. If he cannot eat skunk he is free to eat crow. A factory shut down recently and threw five thousand people out of employment. They are free to go anywhere else; but there is no work when they get there. They might as well have starved at home. What does such freedom amount to?

"It [the government] has given him [the poor man] a good home if he would go on to it and raise a living."

Yes, and there are vast treasures in the deep sea, but how is one to get at them? In the name of common sense, what benefit to the starving millions who roam the country that they can get farms in the West, when they are out of employment and have not a cent to buy bread with? How are they going to get there with their families—build houses, buy teams and tools and seed, and live until they can raise a crop? And worse than all, the great majority of them know no more about farming than a Hottentot knows about the fine arts. Throw a man overboard in mid-ocean, and then tell him if he will swim to land he need not drown.

And at the rate that capital, both foreign and native, is buying up great blocks of land, I want to know how long it will be before there will be no land for the landless? Old Bill Scully owns ninety thousand acres of land in one block, enough to make nine thousand independent homes for the homeless. The men who work these lands are mainly Irish, live in shanties, pay all the taxes, bear all expenses, furnish all the seed, and not a bushel of grain can be sold until the lion's share is secured for old Bill Scully. He lives in London, and manages to take from this country about four hundred thousand a year, not one dollar of which will ever see this country again. Here is your European system, not only hatched, but full fledged and ready to reproduce its kind. But I suppose a man has a "right to do with his money as he thinks best."

"And now the poor man of the old country is enjoying liberties of our free institutions that the rich man's money has built up and maintains."

And that is the one thing which ails us. The rich man's money has brought over thousands of foreigners to underbid and degrade the American laborer, because he (the rich man) wanted cheap labor, and he has got it. I was riding with a gentleman, and we passed an Italian with a cat in his arms. "That cat will make a dinner for him," said my companion, and he pointed to a little, low building and told me how many Italians were quartered there. What self-respecting American wants to live on cats and garbage, and be packed away in shanties like herrings in a box, in order to compete with this foreign element? But this is just what he must do. He must work for the wages of the foreigner, live as the foreigner lives, eat cat and crow, or the foreigner will take his place.

But we must not "blame the rich man for using his money as he thinks best."

"Never were there any better times for the poor man than 1893."

Well, that is decidedly rich. Go tell it to the thousands of starving poor in the city of New York, where one woman wears $14,000 worth of gold and diamonds, and another pays $1,000 for a collar for a pet dog, and another makes shirts for three cents apiece and works all winter without fire in order to save enough to keep her children from starving. Proclaim it to the one hundred and forty thousand people in Chicago out of employment and begging for bread, where millions of bushels of grain are stored and mountains of beef and pork are killed and packed every week. Declare it to the thousands of miners and citizens who wander friendless and homeless through the land without where to lay their heads. Good times for the poor man in 1893! when it is estimated that there are two millions of people out of employment with nothing on earth to sell but their labor, and no market for that. No doubt Mr. Brayton is a good man, but as to his supposed facts, they are like the old woman's teeth—one is gone and the others are missing.

Secretary Windom said, "Capital had bought, or was fast buying up, the Associated Press and closing the avenues of knowledge to the people." Mr. Bland said recently that "capital had got control of the Metropolitan Press." And brave John Swinton said at an editors' convention: "You are intellectual prostitutes. There is not one of you who dares to print honest opinions. If you did you would be out on the street looking for a job. You are jumping-jacks—rich men behind the screen pull the string and you dance." No doubt here is the secret of Mr. Brayton's mistakes. He reads papers published in the interest of capital, and never dreams that they are published to lead him astray. Like the Christian who reads nothing but religious literature, he is molded like wax.

Now for Mr. L. G. Reed and the money question. In 1865 Secretary McCulloch said: "There are nearly $2,000,000,000 in circulation. The people are out of debt—the business of the country is done on a cash basis. Every man who wants a day's work can get it and good wages, and the people are prosperous and happy." And this was right on the heel of one of the most expensive and destructive wars known in modern times, when it is generally expected that depression must follow. There was not a dollar in gold or silver in circulation, yet we had the most prosperous times in the history of this nation.

Can every man get a day's work and good wages now? Is business done on a cash basis? Are the people out of debt and prosperous and happy? What caused these prosperous times? The amount of money in circulation—more than $70 per capita. It is generally stated at about $50. But the $2,000,000,000 did not circulate in the South at all. There were about thirty-five million inhabitants—twenty-five millions North and ten millions South. If two billion be divided by twenty-five million, it will be found to give over $70 per capita. And here is the secret of the good times in 1865.

Would not the same cause produce the same result to-day? If not, why not?

Wherever paper money has been tried, it has produced prosperous times, as it did here in 1865. Venice used neither gold nor silver as money for more than six hundred years, but issued full legal-tender paper money, which brought to her such prosperity as was never heard of in the history of nations. And it continued up to the time of the Napoleon wars.

Franklin was instrumental in establishing a system of full legal-tender paper money in the colony of Pennsylvania, known as the Franklinian system, which lifted that colony out of debt and brought the most prosperous times in its history, and lasted up to the time of the Revolution.

France was conquered by Germany and lost two of her most valuable provinces, and had to pay Germany an indemnity of $1,100,000,000. Yet, by issuing full legal-tender paper money, and making it plenty, kept every man to work, paid off her debt in a comparatively short time, and is to-day one of the most prosperous nations in the world.

Germany, on the contrary, demonetized silver, reduced the currency, made money scarce, and in consequence her people are poor and oppressed.

You see a hundred Germans in this country to one Frenchman. Why? Because the German is poor and discontented, and seeks to better his condition. The condition of the Frenchman is far better, and he has no occasion to leave his native country.

Having seen that full legal-tender paper money has brought prosperity in every instance whenever used, let us see if it is Constitutional money, and if there is power to make it.

The Constitution declares that "Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof." Thus the power to make money is placed in the hands of Congress, and it rests nowhere else. But the Constitution does not prescribe the material that money shall be made of. Therefore Congress is left free to choose its own material.

You say "the attempt through faith to make paper of equal value of gold is somewhat like the notion that God made the world out of nothing." I am inclined to think that paper is greater in value than gold. I think we could do better without gold than paper. But whether paper can be made the equal of gold or not, Congress can certainly make a paper dollar perform all the functions of a gold dollar. It is evident that you have studied the money question just about as the Christian has the God question.

Let us see. Money is a medium of exchange. No matter what material it is made of, so that it is convenient. It need not be valuable, because its function is only to mature value.

We want to know the length of a stick of timber, and we lay on the rule. The rule does not affect the length of the timber; it is neither longer nor shorter. The rule need not be gold nor silver; it will measure as accurately if wood, steel, or iron. A man has two cows for sale, and one is so good a cow that he asks $50 for her. The other is so poor a cow that he will take $20 for her. Now, the kind of money which is paid for these cows does not affect the value of the cows one iota, any more than the rule affected the length of the stick of timber. As the rule measured or expressed the length of the timber, so the money measures or expresses the value of the cows, and this is the true function of money. The value of the cows depends upon the amount of milk and butter they will yield, and not upon the kind of money paid for them.

Now for another step. I am leading you along just as I would a Christian from the errors of superstition into the broad light of truth and reason.

Congress takes sixty cents worth of silver bullion and by legislative enactment pumps a dollar of money value into it. And if Congress should take one-half or one-quarter of the silver and declare that it should be full legal tender for a dollar, we should be as much bound to obey that law as any other act of Congress. And it would be a far more convenient dollar than the present silver dollar. There is one cent's worth of nickel in a five-cent piece; ten cent's worth of copper in a hundred cents. So Congress decides. We obey the law, and nobody is cheated.

Now, if an act of Congress can make $1 in money out of ten cent's worth of copper, can it not go one step farther and make $1 out of a piece of paper? The Supreme Court says it can. The trade dollar, containing seven and a half more grains of silver than the standard dollar, was worth about sixty cents, when the standard dollar was worth one hundred cents. This ought to show you that the law not only determines values, but makes and unmakes money.

According to the idea that the money value of a silver coin depends upon the amount of silver it contains, I want to ask you if the trade dollar contained seven and a half grains more silver than the standard dollar, and was worth forty cents less, how much more silver must be put into it to make it worth nothing?

I hold in one hand a full legal-tender paper dollar and in the other a gold dollar. The paper dollar will pay just as much, buy as much, as the gold dollar, and is much more convenient. Now, what is the difference to me in the cost of these two dollars? The bullion in the gold dollar cost me a day's work before it was coined, then I had to give to the government a day's work to get the dollar after it was coined. Then in loss to the coin by abrasion and in interest on the day's work which I paid for the bullion in ten or a dozen years will cost me another day's work. Now what did the paper dollar cost me? Just one day's work to get it from the government. Would not prudence dictate that I should use the cheaper dollar?

All the time spent in digging gold and silver out of the mines, which is put into money, and all the time spent in coining it is a dead loss to this country. Men thus engaged might just as well be divided into two gangs, and one gang set to digging holes in the ground and the other gang to filling them up again.

The trouble is, men do not arrive at conclusions by a course of reasoning. They derive their ideas by contact with others, by hearing ideas often expressed, and thus they are rubbed in, or on, so to speak, very much as one gets daubed by going through a paint shop.

The Christian believes that God created man, and that it was a good job. Then a snake knocked him out and made him so almighty mad that every soul he created for thousands of years he brought into existence only to sputter in a brimstone stew. Then his wrath so far abated that he came down and suffered himself to be killed in order to open up a way whereby one out of a hundred might twang an imaginary harp in an imaginary heaven.

Now, Mr. Reed, I am inclined to think that you have obtained your ideas of money as the Christian has obtained his ideas of God and the Bible, viz., by hearing the minister talk. If nine-tenths of all Christians would read the "Age of Reason" and take THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, and carefully read it, they would realize how flimsy the arguments are upon which the whole Christian fabric rests. So, if you would read "Bryant on Money," "Brice's Financial Catechism," or some other standard work on money, you would entertain far different opinions from what you do now. Best wishes.

JOHN PECK.

"Spirits" Upon the Dissecting Table.

The persistent efforts of spiritists to multiply themselves and to create full-fledged men and women who can live forever from nothing, is, to say the least, extremely amusing. So I, as well as Brother Perry, have had plenty of amusement of late years. The question now is, Who is laughing at the other's expense?

I insist simply man is man. Brother Perry insists something not man may also be man. I insist man necessitates animal organism; he insists man can exist when all that constitutes a man is absent. I believe man is bred, born, lives, dies, and vanishes as such form; he believes that he is bred, born, dies, his organic form decomposes, yet a perfect man, identical in outline, features, functions, and talents survives. I believe man's physical body is the cause, consciousness or mind the effect. Brother Perry insists that the effect can continue when the cause has vanished. I believe mind is a function of the animal organization; Brother Perry that it is an entity—"a finer organization"—yet without components or parts that he can name. I believe consciousness, as manifest in monad or man, is generated from the vital electro-magnetic forces, engendered by means of the subtle and complex chemistry of the living animal organism; he complacently insists that all this is not needed to perpetuate the dual-man or "spirit!"

I insist that the physical organic form is a necessity to the origin and the continuation of a living being. That the nervous system is a necessity to consciousness; blood, or a circulating fluid and its concomitant organs, veins, and arteries, etc., to individual life. That such life is, furthermore, dependent upon the functions of the stomach and its chemical processes. That physical organs are an absolute necessity to produce sound, sight, taste, feeling, and thought. All our sciences declare such to be facts. All our knowledge is confined to these truths, verified by experiment and demonstration.

If the physical organs of thought, sight, hearing, tasting, smelling, respiration, assimilation, etc., are not an absolute necessity to the existence of a perfect man, then all empirical sciences, all self-evident facts, all knowledge is a delusion and a fraud.

But no rational mind disputes such facts concerning man. Man is an animal, and as such strictly subject to all conditions and laws governing the animal world. No one would insist that man can see without eyes, hear without acoustic organs, breathe without lungs, think without a brain, feel without a nervous system, or live with his heart dug out. But all these essentials to man's life and consciousness after death disintegrate, vanish as such forms, assume other forms, and are no more. This also is self-evident.

Now the laugh comes in: I insist man now is no more. Brother Perry, however, that when all which originally constituted man—his form, organs, anatomy, flesh, blood, brain, and all—has undergone chemical decomposition, and is now contained in soil, fluid, shrub, and worm, that yet the identical man—same in form and function—survives, and without such physical form can henceforth exist during all eternity as well as with it!

But what is the plain self-evident truth? That man exists no more. This I assert—nothing more, nothing less. This requires no proof, all know it. Mr. Perry might as well find amusement in the fact that I believe that twice two equals four, as to laugh because I frankly insist—in spite of the almost universal clamor to the contrary—that when a man is dead he is dead!

Now let us see if I am justified to find amusement in the fact that otherwise sensible men and women believe that when man is dead he is not dead, or that man can live without organic form.

What survives when man is dead and buried or cremated? His "spirit." What is this "spirit?" A dual form of man, embodying identical form and functions of the original man. What constitutes such "spirit form?" A "finer organism," Mr. Perry says. What constitutes such "finer organism?" No answer. Has it anatomy, organs, flesh, blood, nerves, etc.? No answer. What are they composed of? No answer. Has it weight? No answer.

Now let us place a living man upon a dissecting table and beside him Mr. Perry's ideal "spirit." Let us apply the scalpel and note the difference. First we make a deep and bold incision in the abdomen of the physical man. He squirms in agony, the blood gushes forth, he is soon dead. His "spirit," however, "escapes" unharmed. How? Whether from the gaping wound, from his mouth, or other orifice, spiritists have never agreed upon. (Such organic form escaping from within another organic form being a physical impossibility or miracle.) But we proceed with our operation. We cut further and deeper, and soon discover the most complex and subtle organism in existence—"the crowning work of nature" indeed! Every incision reveals delicate tissue, nerves, ganglia, organs, and all the necessary parts to constitute the perfect living man.

Now, let us make an incision into the "spirit." What is revealed to us? Taking for granted Mr. Perry's "finer organism" to be upon the dissecting table, we slash away, expecting of course to see manifestations of anguish and pain. But the result is startling. Not a motion is visible, not a drop of blood forthcoming. We dig deeper, cut a gash here and there with same results. We look closer to discover signs of organic form, nerves, anatomy, organs—alas! all in vain. We put on our strongest "glasses," apply a microscope, but there is absolutely not a solitary thing in sight. Now we make a gash deep into the heart (where it should be) and expect at least a flinching or squirming as the immediate result of the wounds inflicted, but, upon gazing upon the placid countenance of the "spirit," we still behold the same don't-care-a-damn kind of an expression, as if to defy us to do our worst to inflict an injury! And just then it occurred to us what a big fool we were to expect to hurt, wound, or kill an "immortal spirit," who by virtue of his (miraculous) being is beyond injury from carving knives, guns, or dynamite!

Finding nothing upon closest investigation inside or outside of such "spirits," nothing that has tangibility, weight, chemical attributes, etc.; nothing that has color, taste, smell, solidity, etc., is it, I insist, not amusing that sensible men and women believe their individuality can be perpetuated during all eternity with an airy nothing?

But our good and, no doubt, earnest friend ingeniously refers to the unseen forces of nature which are such potent factors in cosmic phenomena. But it avails him nothing to seek an analogy for "spirits" here. To be a "spirit," and all it implies, it must be organic. To be a husband, wife, son, or daughter to us in the "sweet by and by," such "spirits" must be of organic form. This again implies anatomy, organs, circulating fluid, and heart; also brain, etc. Can the outline and functions exist without interior organism to create such outline and functions? Can such organs, fluids, chemistry, etc., exist without being manifest to our ordinary senses or in the open court of science? Can such organism resemble air, ether, electricity, or other organic forces of nature? If not, does not Mr. Perry's analogy fall flat to the ground?

All spiritists insist that a "spirit" in man, not man himself or his material body, does the thinking while man still lives. If this is so, our "spiritual" power of conception must be as acute now as after such a "spirit" escapes the grosser body. Now I ask our friend, in all candor, if it is in his power at the present time intelligently to grasp such a "spirit?" Let him divest the human form of garments, then of flesh, blood, anatomy, etc., and what, in the name of reason, is left to create such a form from? If reality, it must be something. If of the appearance of man, it must be again a body which has such appearance (air, electricity, gravity, cannot possibly assume the form of man); if of such appearance it must resemble flesh and blood; if it resembles the flesh, blood, hair, and teeth of man, it must be such physical flesh, blood, hair, and teeth. If not, how can the appearance of such forms be real in the absence of the substance which alone constitutes such appearance?

"Spirit," in the abstract, being undefinable, utterly unthinkable, and absolutely beyond scientific analysis, all theories explaining (?) certain mysteries upon such basis are illogical and unreasonable. As the idea of a God, not only not explains but infinitely increases cosmic mysteries, so the overwhelming mystery of finite "spirits" per se, or of "spirit" in itself, is so vastly greater than all the trivial mysteries of so-called "spirit phenomena," that until such "spirit" is first established upon a scientific basis, all candid minds—however reluctantly—are compelled to reject peremptorily the same in explanation.

I consider it far more reasonable to believe that the powers mentally and physically (maybe as yet unknown to us) within Mr. Perry or in a little child might "gently raise a table or a piano with one or a dozen persons on the same," than to believe that a "spirit" nonentity or nothing could do it. I believe the full capacity of humanity in that direction is not yet known. I am not ready to dispute the psychical powers of anybody to any extent. I believe most of it being performed by man has a rational basis. In my opinion it is infinitely less mysterious how a "medium" by skill or cunning, in spite of Brother Perry's vigilance, should write or paint between two slates than that the dead, who exist no more, can do it.

But now I positively have the laugh direct on our good brother. In his able defense of "spiritism" he proves too much! Even on the basis of "spirit" existence he relates a miracle: On five locked slates, which he received from a "medium," the "spirits" of his son and daughter wrote, and "on one painted a large rose in all the natural colors," and not a particle of any pencil or paint was placed between the slates!

Now, if not miracle, what is it? Fraud! Does not Brother Perry know that writing and painting are purely material processes, and that certain materials, conditions, and time are absolutely necessary to produce such results? When "spirits" then are said to write without pencils, paint without paints and brush, or "materialize" them from the atmosphere (positively not containing the elements necessary to produce paints, oils, bristles, etc.) in a few moments, it is self-evident to all penetrating minds that the whole performance is a fraud!

Conditions favoring so-called "spirit phenomena" always favor fraud. Why are oil-paintings or crayon drawings made in a few moments (?) behind drapery, or on the surface of the canvass reverse from spectators, but never in plain view of the audience? Because these conditions favor fraud. Why can "spirits" write between two slates under a table, but not simply on one slate on the table, in plain view? Because such conditions favor fraud. Why can "spirits" do certain "tricks" when hidden by a single board of the cabinet, but not outside of the cabinet? Because the board supplies the conditions favoring fraud. Why is darkness a necessary condition to all successful "seances?" Because it favors fraud. Conditions—except those favoring fraud—in all the above cases would be practically identical.

"Spirit forms," as such, being beyond the reach of scientific analysis and utterly unthinkable when divested of natural physical attributes; and all so-called "spirit phenomena," being extremely vague and uncertain—in large proportion accepted to-day and rejected to-morrow—such abstract existence of "spirits" towers so far above the trifling mysteries of such "manifestations"—at most on a par with other cunning feats of legerdemain—that to offer them in explanation but infinitely increases the mystery.

It is not my intention, neither have I the ability, to shed new light upon the mysterious origin, character, or relations of body and mind; but only to prove that without such physical body mind does not originate, exist, or survive. Also that, of all profound mysteries, such "spirit bodies" or "finer organisms," not physical, cap the climax of all mystery!

Do you insist that the physique of a Humboldt does not explain his colossal intellect? Place his "spirit body," which you assume exists within his physical body, beside the latter, if in the power of your imagination, then tell me how much nearer you explain his mind in conjunction with such "spirit," or this "spirit's" mind, than in the physical alone? Do you insist on a "spirit" within his physical body during life to explain his psychical powers, then, by parity of reasoning, you are compelled to conjecture another such "spirit" inside of this "spirit" to explain his mind, and another in this, and so on ad infinitum; and when you get through "calling up spirits from the vasty deep" (of nothing and nowhere) how much nearer are you then to explaining mind? Do you know how these "spirits" or your "finer organisms" think, or have you simply divested the most complex physical form of nature (an automatic mechanism, bewildering in its delicate complications, and of capacities far beyond our present knowledge, and which, no doubt, is the source or basis of all mind) of all potentiality to feel, think, and reason, and are complacently investing an "airy nothing" or ghost with miraculous powers to do it for him? Sadly failing, however, to explain your "explanation."

Now, Brother Perry, put on your "glasses," apply the scalpel, and dissect your "spirits," then make known to the world what they are composed of. All matter has chemical properties; please tell us what they are. If not matter—"spirits" must go!

There are no eternal forms in nature. Man is a form of matter. Hence not eternal.
Rochelle, Ill. OTTO WETTSTEIN.

Everyone going to Chicago this fall should have a copy of S. P. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" in his pocket. He will find it a great aid to intelligent sight-seeing. Price, 25 cents; 5 copies for $1.

What the New York Herald says:

This is a handy volume to have in your gripsack when you start for Chicago. You can read it while on the way, and so prepare yourself for the wonders of that gorgeous Exposition, and after you get there it will give you a vast deal of useful information, a thousand and one facts, and plenty of interesting statistics concerning the various departments. It is as good a book for this purpose as we have seen.

What New Occasions says:

"Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" is a paper volume of 146 pages, containing a series of thoughtful and original sketches of the World's Columbian Exhibition, by Samuel P. Putnam, the well-known Liberal lecturer. The book is entertaining throughout, and for those whose time for reading and sight-seeing is limited, it will prove more helpful than any of the encyclopedic guides.

International Congress of Freethinkers.

An old proverb says, "Where there's a will there's a way," and the truth of this old proverb has been verified in the arrangements of this Congress. The committee has certainly worked with a will, and the way to success has been opened out to them. Each mail brings some cheery response to our calls for aid, and some grand word of encouragement and hope. Many of our friends who live in the country for miles around have written me declaring their intention to be present. With some of these it will be the greatest trip of their lives, and this Congress, the greatest event in the history of our cause, is the magnet attracting them toward Chicago. There will be crowds at the Congress. One cannot take up a newspaper of Chicago to-day without mentally commenting upon the frequency and number of congresses that are being celebrated in the World's Fair city every week. There are congresses of all descriptions, sizes, and colors. There seems to be, in fact, an almost unlimited free trade in the supply. It is passing strange that no one, not even McKinley, had thought of imposing a tax upon them, and thereby increasing the governmental revenues. There have been congresses of Catholics, Protestants, Single-taxers, Universal Peace, Literature, Education, Medicine, and so on. Throughout the most of them, and more especially the former, superstition has been enthroned as a god, and hypocrisy put forward as a science, and it is truly amazing to see how proficient some men have become with the art. The congress of the world's religions is now in session, and every phase of superstition will vie each with the other to tell mankind at large which of them has succeeded in gulling the people the longest and most successfully. It is quite appropriate that at the close of the latter congress the Freethinkers of the world should meet in convention.

Chicago is now filled with priests and preachers of all denominations. But during the first week of October we want the order reversed—we want to see Chicago filled with Freethinkers. Everyone that can come should make an effort to be with us. Come, let us show our strength. We want to see the hall packed to overflowing, in fact, everything that can be done toward increasing the enthusiasm of the occasion. Observe that not America alone is to be represented in this Congress, but the world. Not America alone, but the world is interested in its success. Not the Freethought world, but the so-called religious world is interested in it as much as we. They will glory in our failure and frown upon our success. Our failure means a more aggressive attitude toward our secular institutions, and a prolongation of church domination in politics. Our success will place them on the defensive, rather than make them the aggressors in this great battle of opinions. This is the position in which we must place them. Far better for us to continue our assaults upon the fortress of faith than to have them combine for the purpose of a general attack. Not that we fear the fight; on the contrary, we invite it. We want to meet at close quarters, if possible, and fight them on their own ground. We have driven them back from one position to another, and we must keep up the fight until the clouds of intellectual darkness, occasioned by orthodox superstitious creeds, have dissipated themselves in the sun of truth and have faded away forever.

In this great Congress of Freethinkers the leaders of our cause the world over will be present, and speeches will be made by people of all tongues, recounting with glowing eloquence the story of their labors for human rights. Bohemia will have her story to tell by capable and faithful workers in our cause. Germany, too, will be there and have her say. The story of the growth of our cause in Russia will be told, and long-suffering Poland will tell us of her wrongs, and the patient though brilliant struggles she has made for liberty. England will be fully represented by Charles Watts, and though his present colleagues cannot be with us in person they will be represented by speech. George Jacob Holyoake, long known as the "Father of Secularism," has sent us an essay from his own pen, written specially for this Congress. Saladin, the brilliant and versatile writer, well known in America by his works, and G. W. Foote, president of the National Secular Society, will both, in all probability, favor us with a like epistle. Every day Freethinkers are arriving in Chicago and are preparing for the Congress. Others have written me that they are on their way, so that the present outlook indicates the greatest Freethought gathering ever held upon this side of the Atlantic. Nearly every one of our lecturers, and all the editors of Freethought journals in America, will be present and take part in the proceedings.

Here, then, is the opportunity for all Freethinkers to become acquainted with those who have devoted their lives to the education of the people in the principles of reform. Seize it, take the advantage this occasion offers. Come, stand up and be counted in the vanguard of liberty's army. Each one who shall attend and give in his or her name as a member of the Congress will receive a handsome certificate of membership, forming a splendid memento of the Congress and the circumstances that have occasioned it. I would say to each one of our friends who may intend coming to the Congress, that the best accommodations may be secured on the west side of Chicago. One thing let me impress upon you. Keep away from the hotels and lodging-houses in the vicinity of the Fair grounds. Good rooms for two persons or more may be had from $4 to $10 a week, while the same kind of a room near the Fair grounds will cost from $7 to $40.

The hotels in Jackson park expect to reap a rich harvest during October, and prices are proportionately exorbitant. Let none stay away on this account, for there are plenty of commodious apartments in other quarters of the city. There are plenty of good rooms on Washington Boulevard, near the hall where our Congress meets, right in the heart of the city and close to all lines of transportation. The fare to the Fair grounds will be only ten cents each way. We will secure all the rooms required in advance, providing those who wish them will write me in time, stating the date of their arrival, how many persons there are in the party, how long they intend to stay, and full particulars. Friends writing to us for rooms should inclose a few dollars, in order to secure them, for we may not have sufficient funds at our disposal to advance a deposit for all who may write; then there will be no mistakes, no disappointments. These rooms will be for the most part in fine private residences, thereby escaping the bustle and confusion of a crowded hotel. Those wanting rooms must write at once. Come one, come all. Chicago is big enough and generous enough, and quite capable of entertaining thousands yet. Let us crowd her more, and let a mighty peal of triumph ring out at our Congress. This will be my last letter to the Freethought public before the Congress meets. All the arrangements are complete. Everything is in readiness and waiting for you to come and take possession. The day of the rally will soon be here, and we are looking forward with joy to the realization of our hopes—a successful Congress, and the meeting with hosts of Freethinkers.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH,
Sec. Freethought Federation of America.

What Are You Going To Do, Brothers?

The Chicago Congress of Freethinkers will of course have a value to its members, who will there meet each other and exchange thought, and also to the readers of its reports, who will be more or less instructed and stimulated by what will be said. What will be said? Enough, no doubt; but what will be done—anything? I notice nothing in the program but speech, speech, speech, and, so far as topics are announced, nothing to be advanced in the addresses to help the progress of secularism, as we call it, among the people and toward its practice, politically, socially, and individually, without which last it is worthless—only a name.

"Secular"—what is secular? The word has ordinarily, heretofore universally, been used to denote business not religious; sacred and secular have meant as different things as wind and water; and, in the mind of the Materialist and independent Spiritualist, the sacred has as little place in the secular, the religious in the rational, as fiction has in fact, as lies have in logic. But, boast not thyself of thine own name until thou hast heard another's claim thereto. The last output of Christian cogitation and pious impudence is this, by Rev. Richard Wheatley, D.D., in his article on the police force in eleven principal cities in the United States, in the Chatauquan, May, 1893:

Purely secular education is the grand panacea of all self-sufficient talkers for all the ills that afflict society. Herbert Spencer, Archibald Alison, and other sociologists, who endeavored to obtain knowledge of facts, have discussed the proposition in all its bearings. Their conclusion is that purely secular education enhances power of mischief, and that as a moral influence, if not wholly neutral, it exerts slight benefactive power. Education that insists on the being and government of God, on personal responsibility to him, and on rewards and punishments as sequential to free moral conduct, is as surely purely secular as training in the truths of arithmetic or geography; for, like them, it rests on undisputed facts known and read of all men. Even if religious, they are not less secular data. The education which excludes them is unscientific—it may be suicidal. Agnosticism, Infidelity, and wickedness are social nuisances infinitely more pernicious to health and happiness than the noxious ones that the police of all cities pride themselves on abating.

Think of that, Freethinkers, secularists! Is there a more egregious falsehood in anything that assumes to be an educational factor? We can excuse ignorance in the laity, and charitably suppose honesty in the common clergy, but must not a D.D., a teacher and author like this Wheatley, know he turns truth upside down? How much show would Freethinkers have in a "secular" government with such a construction and under such an administration as his? Agnosticism a nuisance. What Agnosticism? Agnosticism to the Christian's audacious assumption of a mythical monster who will eternally torment all who dare to doubt what the Christian pretends to tell about him. Infidelity a nuisance. Infidelity to what? Infidelity to the Christian's tyrannical imposition. Wickedness a nuisance. What is the wickedness meant? Contempt of the Christian's demand of obedience to him as one of God's police—going fishing or to the World's Fair on Sunday. God, his government, rewards, and punishments rest on undisputed facts? If they did there could be no Agnosticism. It is the very skepticism about these priestly notions, the very questioning of the alleged "facts," which constitutes the nuisance deplored, the sin "infinitely worse" than drunkenness, licentiousness, robbery, and murder, which the secular police try to abate, and which the secular moralist and reformer would lessen by instruction in the data of the facts of nature and by destroying confidence in the vicarious atonement of religion and eleventh-hour repentance and eternal glory. The liberty to dispute and investigate on these subjects is the right demanded by the thinkers, and without which they were the "dumb, driven cattle" which the holy mokes of Christianity and all other divine institutions have always striven to make and keep them. We are aware that under the thousands of years of priestly "training" in Godism there is little moral character in their dupes and coherents, who teach and have been taught that the only adequate motif of morals is the rewards and punishments they hold out, chiefly awaiting in a remote and uncertain hereafter; otherwise, in the church's fellowship or ostracism; all morality is negated by "Jesus died and paid it all"—only pay the priest. We admit that therefore a sudden revulsion from this belief of godliness by the ignorant would produce a social chaos, for a time; that the priest is needful until his dupes are better instructed by observation and conversation of people preferring decency for decency's (not God's) sake. But with the apathy of so many Freethinkers, who don't think half enough, and the aggressiveness of so many religionists, there is no danger of that.

The fear of hell's a hangman's whip
To keep the "saints" in order.

Freethinkers know enough to behave themselves without it—except sometimes under Christian influence or unbearable provocation by them.

Apathy, alas! We are too much like the old woman who had always borrowed a spinning-wheel, but when she bought one she vowed she would neither borrow nor lend—except a few of us who, out of the irritability engendered at our birth and bringing up at the skirts of superstition, as it is in Jesus, and continued by the schoolma'am, the parson, the Christian Endeavorers, and others who flaunt their "nuisances" in our faces and attempt to gag us, we cannot help crying out against them and seeking the society and assistance of our like and attempting to win the worthiest, the most honest and thoughtful, from the errors of their schooling and the influence of their company. The priest, wherever he could not silence the philosopher and prohibit the scientist, has stolen their thunder and slandered the original proprietors, who have rested too satisfied with the self-security of truth among its friends or foes. Religious power, under whatever name, has always damned everything it could not pervert, destroyed what it could not command, and stolen what it could not destroy, whilst the discoverer, the inventor, the informed, have, for the sake of peace and a crust, sought shelter beneath the eaves of the sanctuary that would otherwise belch anathemas and annihilation. The church is the agency of the college extension which panders to priestcraft; the summer-school and reading-circles are bossed by a band of D.D.'s; the weekly, daily, and monthly press is stultified with superstition though the publishers are often Freethinkers, whilst Freethought has a dozen ill-paid lecturers to combat orthodoxy's thousands of well-cared-for parsons, a half-dozen begging papers, whilst pious literature is sown broadcast.

The schools, whether public or private, from kindergarten to university, are under ecclesiastical or otherwise religious domination. The orphan college founded by the priest-hating Girard is a seminary of the gospel cannibalism. Even the astronomical observatory built by the Freethinking Lick is in the hands of churchly regents, and the prayer-mongers taunt the nature-students with, "If you don't like our style, you are free to go to some school that is not under Christian direction—if you can find it." For shame on Freethinkers that it is not to be found, when they send their own sons and daughters to Christian colleges; when they permit Christian teaching and text-books in the public schools; when they largely support the higher institutions of learning; when they contribute their full share to the public-school funds; when they permit themselves to be taxed for appropriations for sectarian schools; when they are over-taxed on account of the non-taxing of gospel mills; when they have the majority of ballots in their own hands; when they have more than half the wealth and most of the brains of the land; when they make the bulk of the minister's congregation; when the minister himself, out of the pulpit, will court the society of the Freethinker and own himself another but for his bread and butter. Oh, tell it not in Andover, publish it not in the Princeton Review, lest the churchmen should say, There is nothing in secularism.

Tyngsboro, Mass. JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD.

All Honor to the Memory of Richard Proctor.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I notice with surprise that Talmage is announced to deliver the address over the remains of the lamented Richard Proctor on the occasion of the unveiling of a monument erected to his memory in Greenwood cemetery, which will take place October 2d. A more glaring incongruity could hardly be presented than that of a pious mountebank—a first-class charlatan—ranting and driveling a hypocritical rigmarole over the hallowed remains of the fearless Freethinker and astronomer, Richard Proctor—a man who died poor, but whose integrity was unsullied, who would scorn to practice a bold, bluff, dishonorable game, based on twenty-three per cent.

Mr. Proctor was by birth an Englishman, but really a cosmopolitan. He was bred a Roman Catholic, but when truth unfolded her beauties to his comprehensive mind, like an honest man as he was, he openly acknowledged the fact that he could no longer bow in allegiance to the Catholic or any other church which fettered and enslaved the human mind with musty, absurd creeds and dogmas, the relics of barbarous ages. He was fearless in the expression of his convictions, and like those men of gigantic intellect—Darwin, Huxley, Tyndal, and Spencer—with whom he identified himself, he always accepted truth, no matter how much his conclusions might conflict with conventional ideas. He was a perfect gentleman in all his transactions, never aggressive but always able to sustain his opinions, which were the result of a severe mental analysis. Those who were in the habit of reading his articles on various subjects, which for a long time appeared every week in the Newcastle Chronicle, one of the ablest and most widely read Liberal journals in England, will be able to form a conception of the frankness, honesty, and independence of the man, coupled with his expansive intellect. It was in the Chronicle that Mr. Proctor's debate with John Hampton appeared. It lasted many weeks. Hampton was a deluded crank, but a marvelous mathematician, and firmly believed that our earth was flat, and that "de sun do move."

Touching the coming memorial services to the honor of Richard Proctor, I assert emphatically that it is an insult to the memory of one of God's noblemen to have a notorious, canting trickster bellow his shallow platitudes over his remains. Such an outrage would be enough to make the bones of the astronomer rattle in his coffin with indignation.

Let us hope that such an outrage will not be perpetrated. There is one man who could and should represent with dignity and manly sincerity the fitting demands of the occasion, and before the splendor of whose eloquence and inspiring thrill of emotion men would bow their heads in tender sympathy before the tomb of the lamented Richard Proctor. That man is Robert Ingersoll.

AN ENGLISHMAN.

New York Notes.

It was during a discussion with a Christian that my friend the bey, who, though a graduate of Annapolis, had served in the Turkish army, and was an earnest Mohammedan, once remarked: "You laugh at our methods of education, but they are precisely like yours. We do not have so many books, but our scholars recite, and the teachers hear recitations, and that is all your schools do. Education is not a method. It is something beyond that, and our upper classes have as much as yours. If we have no general system, we do not follow an ironclad method, and proclaim, as you do, that it is the best in the world."

"You have boasted of the good results of Christianity. Tell me, what has it accomplished? During my residence in Constantinople I lived among the people as one of them, and I assure you they had no need of a 'Society for the Suppression of Vice' or for 'Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.' Let me illustrate. When the first street cars were introduced into that city, many of the dogs, which, having always had the streets to themselves, refused to get out of the way quickly enough, and were run over by Christian drivers. Were they left by the roadsides to die? No, indeed! Instead of that the ignorant, heartless, and entirely degraded heathen brought out straw for the dumb sufferers to lie upon, and placed food and drink within their reach. Let the tree be known by its fruits."

"What," I asked a Catholic friend the other day, "is the real object of Mgr. Satolli's visit to this country? I have tried to inform myself through the newspapers, but each one gives to him a different mission. Now, can you tell me the facts?"

"You are right," he responded, "the papers have made many misstatements concerning the delegate, but the truth of the matter is this: the Catholic church in America is, or has been rather, what is known as a 'missionary church'—i.e., it has had no supreme prelate or head. The bishops have held all the power, and, being human, often misused it to further their own interests. Besides this, they selected the priests who were to become members of their own order, giving them authority over other priests who had no voice in these elections."

"Again, if a priest were wronged by a bishop, there was no appeal, except to Rome, and this in many cases was too great an expense for the priest to bear. It was to remedy and mitigate these evils that Mgr. Satolli was sent here by the pope. As to his being stationed at Washington, that has no political significance whatsoever. The only reason is that the Catholic University, for which Miss Caldwell left $300,000, will be built there, and it was, of course, selected as the permanent residence of the apostolic delegate."

This certainly reads very nicely, and sounds very plausible, but let me make a suggestion or two. Is there not a significance in the "delegate's" putting in an appearance during a remarkable season of unrest in the Protestant church, and also during a parallel season of dissatisfaction in the Romish church? And as to his intended residence at Washington, this at once exposes the cloven hoof beyond the shadow of a doubt. The tactics of the church of Rome are too time-honored and well known to be mistaken, and too dangerous to be trifled with. All these things culminating during the administration of a president singularly favorable to religious movements of all kinds are warning straws in the wind.

It has been said, in answer to similar charges, that Mgr. Satolli is a most liberal man in his views, and his (alleged) decision in the public-schools affair quoted in substantiation of this argument. It is true that he has shown that kind of a disposition, and very wisely so. Mgr. Satolli is the representative of the pope, and must necessarily be, above all things, a diplomat. And would it be diplomacy to put himself in an unfavorable light with the general public of this country in order to please a few fanatics among his followers?

And, apropos, I should like to ask why, when the Homestead rioters wanted arms, they found them in the cellar of the parochial school; or what is the object of putting the Sunday-school scholars of a certain Catholic church in this city through a military drill for one or two hours each Sunday? Pro majorem gloriam Dei? LINDSLEY FLAVEL MINES.

Yes, Canvass!

BENTON HARBOR, MICH., Aug. 31, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you twenty-five cents for "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," by S. P. Putnam. I hope to be able soon to give you an order for Freethought books amounting to $10. We Liberals are expecting to have J. E. Remsburg in this city some time next month. If you can let me have a reasonable commission on Freethought works I would devote considerable time to canvassing. My tracts and books are out all the time.

W. H. CONLEY.

Yes, Money Is Very Helpful.

ARCH BEACH, CAL., Sept. 4, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: They say money talks, so here is $8 that says Freethought must move on and surge to the front till down-trodden humanity will look up for support, not to a mystic power, but to reason. We cannot afford it as a donation, however. It has two missions to perform—first, to help our leaders to keep the flag above the cross, and second, to circulate our literature. So put me down for Brother Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought" and the Truth Seeker Library.

J. S. THURSTON.

Five New Subscribers.

ILWACO, WASH., Sept. 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I had thought that we had evolved sufficiently to exchange the Christian club of revenge for the mantle of charity.

Not many moons back, we sold and distributed eleven Bible Picture-books, and great was the howl among the sky-pilots. They said any man that would distribute such books should be sent to the state's prison.

Hence we feel slightly exultant over the fact that we send you a club of five names for THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year.

When we see the attitude of the church, from the halls of Congress down to the rural district, we think it should "nerve the heart and steel the sword" of every true Liberal.

J. A. LEEBER.

Judge Goggin's Good Work.

Sept. 11, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I desire that you will call attention with a forcible editorial to the central fact that by the dispensation of a mysterious providence and the judicial grit of Judge Goggin the World's Columbian Exposition is a Sunday show pure and simple. To use an expression more striking than classic, the Sabbath-mongers are completely "knocked out."

Now, let a Sunday be appointed some time in October and let it be understood that every Liberal who can will attend on that day, and if possible let Col. Robt. G. Ingersoll be induced to speak on some appropriate theme in order that we may sufficiently show our appreciation of the good geni who have adduced this most glorious consummation; for it does look as though it is a triumph over bigotry, intolerance, and theological devilry that never ought to be allowed to pass without a supreme effort to acknowledge the goodness of the benign fates in thus giving Liberalism this victory over nineteenth century fanaticism.

B. G. MORRISON.

The Mexican Colony.

TOPOLOBAMPO, SINALOA, MEX., }
Aug. 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please publish this for the benefit of some of your readers who have been thinking about coming down here. I have been here three years, and know whereof I speak. Things have been badly misrepresented here of late in the columns of the Credit Foncier paper, and many people—perhaps eight or nine hundred—have come here and got disheartened and gone back; over forty have left during the last six weeks. I wish to deny through your paper a few Credit Foncier lies. First, there never has been any Credit Foncier Company organized in Mexico, not $1 worth of stock has ever been issued to anybody. There are no school advantages whatever. They have no saw-mill nor never had but a few hundred feet of poor lumber on the old thing they did have when I first came here. They have never brought one pine log down the river yet. There are one hundred and eighty kickers organized, and they are lawing with the Owenites and Wilberites daily, and everything is in an unsettled condition, and let no Freethinker think of coming down or investing his money until the difficulty between the two companies is settled.

A. BUTTERFIELD.

An Old Friend Renews Greetings.

PORT JERVIS, N. Y., Sept. 3, E. M. 293.

MR. EDITOR: I am an old admirer and reader of your most valuable paper and I prize it highly. I am a stranger in this place and have not found any readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER yet, but hope this will meet the eyes of some and will be a means of our becoming acquainted. I have found a few Liberal-minded people here, but not many.

The Baptist's joss-house was burnt here September 1st. I was at the fire and saw lots of the church-members there, but did not see one of them down on his marrow bones asking their Joss to save his temple from destruction. Oh, no. But they put their faith in the fire companies. Mustard seed faith is good for nothing in a case like that and the Christians know it, too.

I received a letter from an old friend of mine in Binghamton the other day and this is what he says in it:

"I went to church (Methodist) at Lester-Shire Sunday and heard the Rev. Mr. Wilbur spout. Suffering Moses, how I was edified, especially by a story he told of a man who was blind and restored to sight by prayer at the Sidney camp-meeting years ago. Oh, yes; I was well-acquainted with the facts in the case. It was a professor in one of our schools up there. The prayers of course gave the man faith that he should see; so he came down here to Binghamton and had Dr. McFarland, I think it was, remove a cataract from his eye, and behold! the obstruction removed, he could see. As big a fool as I am I could have told him that it required no particular faith to believe that."

Thus it is the world over. The lying hypocrits will rob science of all its possessions to build up their own rotten religion.

I receive the paper through a friend of mine, as I am too poor to subscribe, but hope some day to be able to become a life-long subscriber to such a valuable paper and to be able to possess some of the sterling books published by the same company.

An old Liberal and Freethinker,

R. M. TUCKER.

The Proposed University.

KEARNEY, NEB., Sept. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I am rejoiced to see that Mr. S. P. Putnam has seconded my long-cherished idea of an Ingersoll or Freethought university, set forth in THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 22d.

Brother Putnam, with his enthusiasm, eloquence, and energy, is just the one to inspire Freethinkers to give money and labor for this great and important project. If one million Freethinkers of the several million in our country would respond as has our friend Wittenburg, of New Era, Ore., with $5, or even $1, the Freethought university would be an assured fact. Mr. Putnam is right in saying that a small beginning should be made. A location and a building, even though small, would be evidences of good faith, and in time all other things would follow, such as an observatory, a library, scientific apparatus, statues of Freethought's heroes and heroines, and the other useful and beautiful adjuncts. He is also right in saying that Freethinkers should imitate the Catholics in their persistency and desire to spread their faith. The writer has during her lifetime seen institutions started with a log house and a few hundred dollars, which have since risen to positions of honor and usefulness, and are now recognized throughout the country. Why can we not do as well or better? Shall we stand by with helpless hands while Catholics and Protestants boast what they are doing and how their schools are flourishing? We should not be ashamed of a small beginning. I know of no project which holds so much in store for present and future as this. It is for the liberty and intelligence of posterity that Free-thought works, and which we should attempt to preserve.

Let this great and inspiring work be inaugurated at the coming Freethought Congress, and plans laid whereby posterity may be endowed with a priceless heritage of knowledge, culture, and enlarged thought. Let the Freethinkers of to-day lay the foundation of a temple where Reason and Science shall sit enthroned, the true Goddesses of Liberty, in a true home, after being the degraded outcasts of all past centuries; where Thought shall wear no chains; where prison bars and fagot's flames shall not prevent men and women from making their ideals the living realities of the future. Let this great work be started, and ere the golden hinges turn and old Father Time swings back the doors that shall usher in a new century, its rosy light may fall upon the grandest achievement of all ages, a Freethought university, as Brother Putnam puts it, "free from top to bottom."

MRS. VANESSA MARCIA GOFF.

The Chinese Muddle.

NEW YORK, N. Y., Sept. 8, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It seems to me that H. Sandberg takes a very narrow view with respect to the Chinese. He talks about the system under which the Chinese come to this country. Who created that system? He says the Chinese are owned soul and body by the Six Companies. Why not go for the Six Companies? Is the slave any worse than the slave-holder? Is the robbed any worse than the robber? The alien bill recently passed by the French Chamber of Deputies contains ten times as much justice as the Geary law, in that it provides that all foreigners shall register, making no discrimination in favor of one as against another.

The Chinese have their faults, but so have other nationalities. Opium dens are no worse than gin shops. Traffic in women is to be deplored and condemned whether carried on by Chinese or the Europeans. The Chinese should no more be ostracised than the white people of other lands who incite to riot and disorder in a foreign tongue because we do not adopt their peculiar notions.

It is to be hoped that the World's Congress will consider the question of establishing Freethought societies in the principal cities of the United States, and also of suggesting how those already established may be endowed with increased activity and usefulness. There are twenty-eight cities in the United States which have more than one hundred thousand inhabitants. Cannot something be done toward planting a wide awake Freethought society in each one of these cities, and suggestions offered as to how it can be kept alive and growing? Freethought societies scattered all over the country would in time exert a powerful influence for good if properly conducted. Only through them, in my opinion, is it possible to maintain a Freethought university or a home for aged Freethinkers. To give them character and stability, they should do what the church does—marry, educate, minister to the sick, and bury its members. Would it not pay to employ one or more organizers to establish these societies, and have them make regular visits to see they are kept wide-awake?

JOHN C. ROE.

The Way the Christians Do It in Chattanooga.

CHATTANOOGA, TENN., Sept. 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I note Mr. S. F. Benson's and W. O. Decker's letters, and S. P. Putnam's reply, in your issue of September 2d, upon, "What Shall the Congress Do?" Mr. Benson gives the business processes of the church. A like system prevails here. Our city is full of churches—they control all departments of local government, control the schools, take possession of the minds of all the children; the country is full of exhorters and revivalists; they pound the pulpits until the women and the young actually believe their teaching. They howl of hell-fire and damnation, hypnotize and mesmerize all who are uninformed, young, or weak; force them to the mourners' bench, and to make public acknowledgment of conversion, and subscribe to the church. The preacher takes the last mite, and hounds the people day and night, and at this time —when there is a great panic and distress—they are inducing everybody to fall upon their knees and with their backs to the country pray unceasingly in utter disregard of all earthly surroundings. So it is that if it is proposed to corrupt the government or despoil the nation all that is necessary is to start the pulpit-pounder out and the purpose of despoiling them of their senses, property, and liberty is an easy task. Our Sunday-schools first, then prayer-meeting, then preaching; then comes the revivalist, whom all rush to see, and then to give their hand, and then be like the others, fall down and pray and howl to be saved from hell, and then to return home to be and remain lunatics or hypocrits for the remainder of their lives. Not one in five hundred can escape their assaults. I live in a suburb of Chattanooga, in which there was no lawyer, no doctor, no preacher, no justice of the peace, no constable, and no church until recently, when the Sunday-school began, and some stale preaching. For the past month we have passed through the ordeal of a revival. They have cleaned up the place. Myself, about two neighbors, and, as I put it, a large pine stump only have withstood them. With such surroundings what can Secularists do? The young are stolen, mentally degraded, and despoiled; not one in a hundred can escape them. Thus Freethinkers are driven away from the children and youth to the quiet retreat and the university, as shown in the reply of Mr. Putnam. It seems that reason cannot stand before the conspiracy and curse of the Christian system.

J. W. JAMES.

The Only Infidel in His Town.

ITHACA, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: As I am the only genuine Infidel in this city, and being a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last two years, I thought I would write a few lines to you. I take the paper of a news agent. All the Christians hate me for my belief; and I can out-argue any theologian in the world, and take my text from his own book. Now, they say that the Lord knows everything. Well, did the Lord know when he made Adam and placed him in his garden that Satan, whom he had created, would come into that garden and coax that poor little innocent woman to partake of that fruit? Did he know that his devil was going in on purpose so that he would have an excuse to throw poor old Adam and Eve out of the garden? Was not that a farce? Why did the Lord repent to think he had made man? Poor, foolish old Lord! he did not know what he was about, or else his Satan was too smart for him. Oh, that old devil! I have always been sorry he created him. I wonder if he knew what he was about when he created this Satan, his partner? It takes all the priests and preachers over one-seventh part of their time to keep that old devil down. He got so much the start of the Lord that he had to send the Holy Ghost down to the Virgin Mary, and she had a son, said to be the best man on earth, and he lived a life of persecution, the same as I do for my belief. At last he was taken and crucified for his belief, the same as his followers would me if they dare; but to think that his father should allow, under his own eye, the best son that ever lived to be nailed to a cross, when he asked him, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" while at one swoop he could have wiped the whole earth out of existence. Show me the meanest man in any town that has got a pretty bad son, to let a gang of hoodlums take his bad son and nail him to a cross alive, and all for something that he has created himself, knowing just what it would be when he created it. How he must have loved that son. But finally, at last, he only died for a few, for the majority die without Christianity, and if he has a hell to put me in I do not wish to cheat him out of his job. The Bible was made by priests, and they rule the people with an iron rod. They take the children as soon as they are out of the cradle and teach them to love what the priests do. You must not offend one of them; if you do, he will have his God send you to hell. I do not like Jesus for turning water into wine and treating the crowd. And finally I believe the Bible to be a myth, the most obscene, lying book ever published.

If I get able I may start a bookstore—all Liberal works.

I am an old Union soldier, and draw $12 per month, if Hoke Smith does not cut me off; will be seventy-three in January, but am as smart physically as a boy. I have been to the Bath Home, but they fired me out because I was an infidel; but if they had allowed me to talk I would have converted one-half the old soldiers there was there. They put up a job on me. I gave a corporal an old briar pipe, and he stuck it in my pocket, and then went and told the officers I stole it, so I left.

Send me THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 12th; I missed it. WM. L. MARSH.

The Old-Fashioned Heaven.

BUFFALO, N. Y., Sept. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR:

The old-fashioned heaven was up in the sky,
A place exceedingly small,
The great white throne nearly covered the space,
And the saints stood close to the wall.

The golden harps were stowed under the throne,
And the balconies hung over hell,
And sinners were plunged beneath the flood,
And the saved could hear them yell.

The howling in hell to justified ears
Was meat and drink for them all,
And the smell of toasting souls was sweet
To the saints that stood by the wall.

THE OLD-FASHIONED HELL.

How dear to my heart are the scenes of my childhood,
Now that fond recollection paints them so well,
Of the cot and the barn and the deep tangled wildwood,
And the old-fashioned minister that taught us of hell.

With what anguish of mind I remember my boyhood,
As is recalled to my view that old-fashioned hell,
The orthodox hell, the fiery old hell, the hell where the driftwood
Of mankind could tumble and fight and could yell.

The hell of my father—how dear to his soul
Was this old-fashioned hell, this moss-covered hell,
That existed to him in some wild unknown hole—
Where the trembling old sinner was toasted in hell.

Oh! hell of my childhood, thou Methodist hell,
As hot as brimstone and blazes could make it smell—
Without a drop of water from an old-fashioned well,
And not a moss-covered bucket existing in hell.

Did your soul in its anguish climb out of the heat,
Some little devil with a jump and a whoop,
Would trot along with his big cloven feet,
And thrust your tired soul down into the soup.

Oh! hell of my boyhood, I dream of thee now,
And horrors on horrors loom up to my view;
And the old-fashioned dominie with hell on his brow
That preached the more hell to your soul as older he grew.

The hell that our forefathers defended,
The hell that from our grandsires descended,
The hell for which all Christians contended,
The hell of my youth, thou art well recommended.

The revivals we had were glowing with hell,
And sinners and saints came trembling with fear;
The sermons were full and reeking with hell,
And the pious old preacher had the best of good cheer.

The old moss-covered story of saints up in glory,

With sinners and devils wallowing in hell,
With heads old and hoary, ghastly, and gory,
Bowed down and weary in that smoking old hell.

This hell was large and wide and deep, and devils manned it;
This hell was placed near heaven where God could scan it;
This hell was a scorcher, and sinners don't forget it;
This hell was everlasting—repent and pray and dodge it.

'Twas the hell that with the souls of infants was crammed;
'Twas the hell that by the ancient old pagans was planned,
'Twas the hell to which all but the Christian was damned,
And it is now the hell of the Methodists all over the land. J. W. DENNIS.

A Live Paper Whose Editor, Artist, and Distributor Should Be Burnt.

PITTSBURGH, Aug. 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: On the 3d of December last I sent you a check for $10 to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year, which uses up $3 of the same, and I then intended to write you soon requesting you to send me some Freethought books for the remainder; but I neglected to do so, because other matters absorbed my time and attention. I am an old man, being seventy-six years of age, and have been a Freethinker from my youth up; but I never read any Freethought literature until in May of last year, when I was sick at the house of a friend in Milwaukee, where I first saw a few copies of your paper, which I read with pleasure; and as soon as I got home I subscribed for it for a few months, to see what further intellectual fruit it would bear, and, as I was pleased with its fruitage, I renewed my subscription, as stated at the head of this letter. In the paper many subjects are rationally and scientifically discussed, well reasoned to a logical and satisfactory conclusion; hence a thoughtful person gains instruction and takes pleasure in reading it; and then there are Heston's pictures, a source of amusement as well as instruction. Heston is a genius in his appreciation of truth and error, as well as of the ridiculous, and he is endowed with great ability of demonstration. In his pictorial illustrations of truth, and his exposures of religious error, he sometimes mixes enough of the ridiculous to make them laughable as well as instructive; and here is where he stirs up the wrath of the clergy, they knowing that the great body of church-members can stand disputation much better than being laughed at, because the horizons of most church-members' intellects are hung too low to get a scientific argument under them, while they can see, understand, and appreciate a picture. Heston suggests a truth, a fact, a principle, or the correction of an error, and then by a picture demonstrates the truth of his suggestion—sometimes affirmatively, by the exhibit of direct and certain proof, and sometimes negatively, by showing that an absurdity would follow if his suggestion was false. The diagrams in Euclid perfectly demonstrate to a clear mind the truth of the theorems to which they are attached, and so it is with Heston's pictures. But as the fifth proposition in the first book of Euclid is called Pons-æssinorum, because dullards in college have great difficulty in getting over it, so an occasional picture of Heston's might be called an asses' bridge for Christians, because they cannot get over it without many a halt and stumble.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is a live paper; contains many bright thoughts; therefore as soon as I read it I give out each copy I receive to others, in order to spread the truth as far as possible; and in doing this I am frequently met with the charge of blasphemy and sacrilege, and one old Scotch Presbyterian said: "Heston, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and you, for circulating such damnable pictures, ought to be plunged into hell,

"To gnash your gums, to weep and wail
In burnin' lake,
Where damned devils roar and yell
Chain'd to a stake."

His use of Holy Willie's prayer I thought was good.

I commenced Freethought at an early age—on my first day in the public school, in a backwoods neighborhood. Before going to school I had learned to read sentences composed of short and easy words, and had read in "Mother Goose's Melodies:"

Old Mother Hubbard
Went to the cupboard
To get her poor dog a bone,
But when she came there,
The cupboard was bare,
So the poor dog had none.

And also many other rhymes in said book. And I also read in the "New England Primer:"

In Adam's fall
We sinned all,

and other things therein. Of course, I understood that the stories in the former were mere fables, but I was instructed that everything in the latter was true and was to be implicitly believed.

I was started to school with two books—a spelling-book and the New Testament. The first contained long columns of words, to be studied, spelled, and pronounced without knowing their meaning or use; and the latter was to be used as a reading-book, and concerning which I was instructed by my parents that it was part of the holy Bible, God's holy book, and that I should study it diligently, so as to understand it and learn to be good, which I promised and determined to do. And I was also told that the master would help me and tell me everything I wanted to know. On the first day of school the boys and girls were arranged in classes (mixed), and composed of those about of the same age, and I was placed second in a Testament class. Our first lesson was concerning the genealogy of Christ, in Matt. i, a subject I was totally ignorant of. I knew no more about the meaning of genealogy than I did about the cube root; but I was anxious to learn, and wished to acquit myself well on the verses that would fall to me to read, the first of which was "Abraham begat Isaac," etc.; and as I studied over the lesson I saw that the word "begat" occurred many times, and must therefore be important, and I wanted to know what it meant. Hence I went with my book up to the master, where he sat like a king on his throne in one corner of the room, and asked him what "begat" meant—what Abraham did to Isaac when he "begat" him? The master frowned on me awfully, struck me several times with a whip, and then told me that that was one of the mysteries of the Bible, that it was wicked to pry into them, and that I should read and believe what I read and not ask questions, or that I would be burnt forever with fire and brimstone. Well, then and there I took the first step in Freethought, for I could not see what use God's holy book would be to me if I must read and believe it without knowing what it meant.

However, I continued to read in the Testament class until we had read the book through two or three times, and although I had ceased to ask questions about it, I did not escape punishment. On one occasion, after we had read about feeding five thousand men besides women and children with five loaves and two fishes, and that they were all filled, and there remained of fragments twelve baskets full, I whispered to the girl next me in the class, saying, "That would have been a good place for Mother Hubbard's dog." She laughed, and the master asked her what she was laughing at. And I told her slyly to tell him, for she and I were the best of friends, and I feared he would punish her severely to make her tell; and she would have stood great severity before she would have told him if I had not whispered to her to tell. Then he punished her for laughing, and me severely for making fun of and ridiculing the Testament. Many other trivial remarks about stories in the Testament, that I did not understand, that seemed doubtful, and I could not fully believe, brought me to punishment, but without convincing me of their truth or of the justice of eternal damnation for unbelief. That teacher was a member of the church (Presbyterian) in which my grandfather was an elder, and, like the other schoolmasters of that time, was a boss tyrant; to his mind, all pleasures among the children were sinful and should be suppressed; his desire seemed to be: "Suffer little children to come unto me, that I may flog them with a whip big enough for an ox goad."

In thus going through the New Testament in the public school, I became a doubter, and lost all respect for my mother's (the Presbyterian) church. But not being satisfied, I undertook to read the Old Testament, and I began at Genesis and continued on through Malachi; and the filthy stuff I found therein sickened me of the Christian's God and his book. True, I found some good therein, but mixed up with such a mass of deceptions, cruelties, absurdities, contradictions, encouraged vices, and nastiness, that I rejected the book. I could not believe in nor worship such a God as is described therein. When I commenced writing I intended to particularize to some extent at this point; but I find my letter is getting too long to do so; hence I will simply remark that the story of the king's daughter saving, adopting, and educating Moses impressed me as good enough to be true; but admitting it to be true (of which I now have grave doubts), his career after arriving at manhood suggests that it might have been better for the human family if some crocodile in the Nile had eaten him, instead of his being saved by the princess. Church members say they believe the Bible to be the word of God, but from my conversations with many of them, I am satisfied that not one in a thousand has ever read it; their utter ignorance of its contents is astonishing; they simply utter, without examination, what they have heard from the pulpit.

I have frequently heard clergymen eulogize the Bible, because of its lofty sentiments, majestic imagery, beautiful poetry, and grand descriptions; and for these reasons urge its use in the public schools, but I have not been able to find that it is superior in these respects to many other books. There are some good poems in it, and the best and purest of them is the song of Moses, after the triumphant passage of the Red Sea. Some other of its poems, like Solomon's songs, are good enough as poetry merely, but are as salacious as anything to be found in Byron, Virgil, or any of the other great poets. And for majesty of diction and grandeur of description, I have not been able to find anything in it superior to what is contained in the works of Milton, Shakespeare, Coleridge, Byron, Virgil, and the blind old man on Chio's rocky isle. Take a couple of samples from Byron, to wit:

Above me are the Alps,
The palaces of nature, whose vast walls
Have pinnacled in clouds their snowy scaples,
And throned eternity in icy halls
Of cold sublimity, where forms and falls
The avalanche—the thunderbolt of snow!
All that expands the spirit, yet appalls,
Gather around these summits, as to show
How earth may pierce to heaven, yet leave vain man below.

And again:
Thou glorious mirror, where the almighty's form
Glasses itself in tempests; in all time, Calm or convulsed—in breeze, or gale, or storm,
Icing the pole, or in the torrid clime Dark-heaving, boundless, endless, and sublime—
The image of eternity—the throne
Of the invisible; even from out thy slime
The monsters of the deep are made; each zone
Obeys thee; thou goest forth, dread, fathomless, alone.

Lastly, take Homer's majestic description of the nod made by him,
Who rolls the thunder o'er the vaulted skies,
in confirmation of his answer to the prayer of Thetis, whom he thus dismissed:

Depart in peace, secure thy prayer is speed;
Witness the sacred honors of our head,
The nod that ratifies the will divine,
The faithful, fixed, irrevocable sign;
This seals thy suit, and this fulfills thy vows,
He said, and awful bent his sable brows,
Shook his ambrosial curls, and gave the nod,
The stamp of fate and sanction of the god;
High heaven trembling the dread signal took,
And all Olympus to the center shook.

Many other samples might be given from these and other poets, and also from prose writers, but the above are sufficient.

KRATAIGOS.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

A German Fable.

A famous hen's my story's theme,
Who ne'er was known to tire
Of laying eggs—but then she'd scream
So loud o'er every egg 'twould seem
The house must be on fire.
A turkey-cock who ruled the walk,
A wiser bird and older,
Could bear no more; so off did stalk
Right to the hen and told her:
"Madam, that scream, I apprehend,
Does nothing to the matter;
It surely helps the eggs no whit,
So lay your eggs and done with it.
I pray you, madam, as a friend,
Cease that superfluous clatter;
You know not how't goes through my head!"
"Humph! very likely," madam said,
Then proudly putting forth a leg—
"Uneducated barnyard fowl,
You know no more than any owl
The noble privilege and praise
Of authorship in modern days;
I'll tell you why I do it:
First, you perceive, I lay my egg,
And then—review it."

A Summer Outing.

I wonder how many Cornerites enjoy horseback riding? No doubt you all do. But did any of you ever take occasion to ride all day long on a warm summer day? If so, you can better understand the experiences of a friend and myself on one of the warmest days of this week; in fact, one of the warmest days of the season. Horseback riding has always been my favorite mode of exercise and pleasure. I have indulged in its pleasures ever since I was a "wee tiny chap," and when I get on the back of a spirited horse I imagine I am as near heaven as I will ever get. I doubt if the throne of heaven itself would have the charm for me that a place in a good saddle has.

On Tuesday morning, having secured a lay-off for two weeks, I decided to take a pleasure trip. The readers of the Corner are no doubt aware that archeology is a fascinating study with me, and having heard that Wyandotte county, Kan., afforded a rich field for archeological research, I advertently made up my mind to spend a day or two amid its prehistoric treasures. In the afternoon I thoroughly equipped myself for the ride. I donned a pair of leggings, strapped a satchel full of necessities over my shoulder, tied a rubber and another coat to my saddle, and placed my trusty revolver in the scabbard. I then mounted my Colorado pony, a spirited though docile animal, and after bidding the folks good-bye, started off on my long journey. I must confess that I felt like a true frontiersman, and my unsightly appearance surely warranted it. I imagined that as I passed through town the people would clear the streets for me, and on reaching the country, I feigned I could see the farmers surrendering the whole road to me. But an incident occurred on the journey which foiled my imagination and which I will relate further on.

After traveling over a very rough road for about nine miles I reached Oak Mills, my old country post-office, from which place I have addressed many a letter to my Corner friends. Here I struck a friend, Richard E. King, whom I persuaded to accompany me on the remainder of my journey. It was then almost night, and so we concluded to resume the journey early the next morning. I spent the night with my cousin, Will Oliphant, and the next morning my friend King met me there, and we started out. He had likewise equipped himself for the journey, and as he rode up, with a resolute expression on his countenance, he remarked, "Well, it is Wyandotte or bust!" My friend King is also a lover of antiquities, and he has a goodly collection of quaint and curious things. He has accompanied me on several occasions, and I am indebted to him for the assistance he has rendered me while exploring this section of the country for evidences of aboriginal occupancy.

Just before reaching the old historic town of Kickapoo we observed a very commanding point near the roadside, and thinking there might be a prehistoric mound or aboriginal place of interment on its summit, we scaled the steep ascent, but our expectations were only squandered. We noticed a basin or depression in the earth near by, and thought it was where some one had opened a mound, but investigation revealed the fact that it was nothing more or less than a modern stone-quarry.

Upon reaching Kickapoo the first thing that met our eager visions was the Kickapoo correspondent of the Leavenworth Times, James Malone; and from his observing countenance he was evidently looking for something to write up. We did not stop, but simply greeted him with the familiar salutation, "Hello, Jim!" and passed on. We did not give him a chance to ask any questions, for we would rather have met the devil than a reporter, anyhow.

We then traversed the beautiful Salt Creek valley, which lies just this side of Fort Leavenworth and Leavenworth city. This valley is at least a mile wide in some places, and there is not a more beautiful and picturesque spot in the varied landscape of Kansas. It is dotted with beautiful homes and farms, and the soil is noted for its productivity. This valley is one of the historic spots of Kansas. The first white settler of Leavenworth county, Major Robert Wilson, settled near the Salt Creek bridge in 1844, and established a trading-post. The house which he built, the first in the county, is still standing. The first country school-house in Kansas was built in this vicinity. It was a log structure about twenty by thirty feet in size. The first teacher was V. K. Stanley, who taught the school in 1856. Mr. Stanley is still living, and is a member of the school-board in Wichita. The celebrated Wm. F. Cody, everywhere known as "Buffalo Bill," lived in this valley for years, and his old home, or a portion of it, is still standing. It would require a volume to enumerate all the historical events of this romantic spot.

Before leaving the valley we stopped at a country store to get a lunch, and while there Dick had a fine pair of gloves stolen. We spotted the man who committed the theft just as he was riding out of sight, and we commenced pursuit, but he had gotten the start of us, and we failed to catch him. We then climbed the Government hill, near Fort Leavenworth and made our entrance into the city of Leavenworth on the bank of the Missouri river. This town was once the metropolis of Kansas. Its population is now about twenty thousand. We stopped here long enough to fill our satchel with provisions to use along the road. From Leavenworth to Lansing the road is macadamized, and we enjoyed this portion of our ride. The state penitentiary is located at Lansing, and about half way between Lansing and Leavenworth is the Soldier's Home. Some of the most interesting points in Kansas are to be seen in a ride from Atchison to Wyandotte, a distance of about forty miles.

We stopped on a large creek south of Lansing, in Wyandotte county, where we camped for several hours and partook of a hearty lunch, and fed our horses. We then resumed our journey, and did not stop again until we reached the village of Walula. Here we paused and held a consultation. It was then getting late in the evening, and every moment was precious. We were much fatigued by our long ride through the intense heat, and I had contracted a severe headache. We decided to turn back as far as Lansing and take a rest. This we did, and upon reaching this place we secured a feed for our horses, and while they were eating we laid down on the grass, and, with our coats for pillows, we took a much-needed rest. It was after dark, and we were among strangers. Therefore, imagine our indignation when some boys passed along and remarked, "Wonder if they are drunk?" This was a cutting remark, for we had never before been accused of drunkenness. Dick looked at me in astonishment, and said, "Wonder if Lansing water makes people drunk?"

We next concluded to finish our journey homeward, and rather than ride through the intense heat the next day, we decided to ride all night and reach home about morning. We struck out, although the night was very dark, and the road for the most part rough and lonesome. My head was aching most unmercifully, and I was sitting sideways in my saddle with my head supported on my arm, and paying no attention to the surroundings. I was suddenly startled by some one calling to me to "Look out!" and upon looking up I perceived that I had unexpectedly come in contact with a cart, in which two ladies were seated. I politely excused myself, and swore to them that I would never be guilty of the like again. Dick, who was a little behind, gave them the whole road, and chided me for my carelessness.

I stopped at a drug-store in Leavenworth and made the clerk prepare something for my headache. As we passed through town that night, everybody stared at us, and we imagined that the police were looking at us in a suspicious manner, because we were suspicious-looking characters. But we congratulated ourselves on the fact that neither of us had a guilty conscience, if our imaginations did run rather high.

When we reached the Government hill it was approaching midnight, and as this place is noted for highwaymen, we carried our revolvers in our hands, ready for an emergency, but fortunately we passed the place in safety. At Kickapoo, we went to the school-house and were going to stop in and take a rest, but the doors were locked, and we were foiled again. From Kickapoo to Oak Mills we had to travel a road leading through a dark, lonesome hollow, next to the river, and which is scarcely ever traveled, especially at night. We managed to get through all right, however, and we reached Oak Mills just before daylight. I stayed with Dick until daylight, and then repaired to my home in Atchison. Although we found no relics of importance, we nevertheless had a pleasant time, and we are going to arrange for another trip at some future date.

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

Atchison, Kan., Aug. 10, 1893.

We received a call the other day from Mr. and Mrs. William Thorpe, of Jersey City, formerly of Ballston Spa. It was a pleasure to see these loyal friends, and an inspiration to listen to them, for they are broad-minded, clear-headed, honest Free-thinkers, whose colors are nailed to the mast-head. They are parents of a bright and interesting family. The daughter Satie will be remembered as being instrumental in procuring a cow for R. M. Casey, recently deceased, and it is pleasant to know that the animal furnished nourishment to Mr. Casey and his invalid wife, and at last was sold to defray the expenses of Mrs. Casey's funeral. "So shines a good deed in this naughty world." May Mr. and Mrs. Thorpe and their happy family live long and prosper!—ED. C. C.

Correspondence.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., Aug. 24, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I saw my sister write a letter to the Corner, so I thought I would write one. I am twelve years old. I go to school, and study reading, writing, spelling, geography, language, arithmetic, and singing. Our teacher's name is Mr. Peck, and he is very strict.

We have three pet kittens, the names of which are Caesar, Brutus, and Antony. I fear my letter is getting too long, so I will close. From your Liberal friend, JENNIE IFFLAND.

CENTRAL POINT, ORE., May 13, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: This is my first attempt to write to the Children's Corner. I am fourteen years old. My home is situated in the center of the Rogue river valley. I live about a mile from a small town called Central Point. In this town there are two churches—Methodist and Baptist.

There are only two or three Free-thinkers around here, but I am numbered with the small list.

My brother has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER about a year, and I like it very much. Well, as my letter is getting rather lengthy for the first time, I will close. Hoping my letter may escape the wastebasket, I remain, yours sincerely, LULA BEALL.

LOUISVILLE, KY., May 18, 1893.

DEAR MISS WIXON: As I have not written to the Corner for quite a while, I suppose you have forgotten me. There are a great many Free-thinkers in Louisville, but most of them are men, and all of my girl friends are good Christians. We are Free-thinkers, and my father takes THE TRUTH SEEKER and a great many more Liberal papers. I read your paper all the time, and especially the Corner. I read a letter a short time ago in the Corner from Daisy Suter, of Alexandria, Egypt. I would like to correspond with her, and if you would not mind I would like you to send me her address. I will send her some stamps, and I would like her to send me an Egyptian one, as I have never seen one.

My father and I met a Catholic priest the other day who had known father for a long time. When he found out that I believed like father, he told me that I was a pagan, and would never get to heaven. I go to church sometimes, but not very often. I am not afraid to tell any preacher or priest that I am a Free-thinker.

Colonel Ingersoll lectured here a few months ago. His lecture was grand. He lectured on Shakspeare. I am very anxious to hear him lecture on religion, and I hope he will come to this city soon again. We always go to hear him. Father thinks he is the greatest orator of the day, and so do I.

I have read "The Story Hour," "Apples of Gold," and "All in a Lifetime." I admire them a great deal.

I hope to hear from you soon. Good-bye. Your Free-thinker friend, LOIS BLIGH CARTER.

[The above letter, together with that of Lulu Beall, became mislaid and has just come to light. Better late than never.—ED. C. C.]

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

REDUCTION IN PRICE OF A GREAT BOOK.

With the eighth edition
Winwood Reade's "Martyr-
dom of Man," the cost of production has been lessened so that we can reduce the price from $1.75 to $1.00.

The book has had a phenomenal sale for so heretical a work, second only to Helen Gardner's "Man, Women, and Gods," and we give our readers the pecuniary benefit of it. The

"MARTYRDOM OF MAN"

Is a very interestingly pictured synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone—its martyrdom—in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty, and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present, adding an outline of what the author conceives would be a religion of reason and love. The chapters are:

WAR. Egypt, Western Asia, the Persians, the Greeks, the Macedonians, Alexandria, the Phenicians, Carthage and Rome, Roman Africa, the Arabs.

RELIGION. The Natural History of Religion, the Israelites, the Jews, the Prophets, Character of Jesus, the Christians, Arabia, Mecca, Character of Mohammed, Description of Africa, the Mohammedans in Central Africa.

LIBERTY. Ancient Europe, Invasion of the Germans, the Castle, the Town, the Church, Venice, Arab Spain, the Portuguese, Discoverers, the Slave Trade, Abolition in Europe, Abolition in America, Materials of Human History.

INTELLECT. Animal Period of the Earth, Origin of Man, and Early History, Summary of Universal History, The Future of the Human Race, The Religion of Reason and Love.

IN THE

Reynolds Blasphemy Trial,

At Morristown, N. J.

This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the Bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal argument is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equalled. Wherever Christian persecution is going on this argument should be freely circulated, read to the Christians, and expounded on every occasion.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrites. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Just Out.—25 Cents.—Five Copies for $1.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral. We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

BY

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible. Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing." In two volumes, cloth, gilt-lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, fancies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right. Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 80 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stairculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE AND OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardner's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Li- tiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abs- on; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attempts at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. In paper, 25 cents.

OF

FREETHOUGHT.

By W. S. BELL.

Containing in condensed and systematized form a vast amount of evidence against the superstitious doctrines of Christianity. As a book of reference and aid to all truth seekers it is invaluable. Its classification of subjects makes it a hand-book. As Ingersoll said of Paine's "Age of Reason," it enables somebody in every village to "corner the parson." Its wide variety of subjects include all the disputed points between Christianity and Freethought. Price, cloth, $1; paper, 50 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Inquirendo Island. A novel. By Hudor Genone. 12mo, 353 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "This book is to me a delightful surprise. In my judgment it is a stronger piece of fiction than Edward Bellamy's 'Looking Backward,' which at times it reminds one of. It is a merciless exposure of Pharisaism and hypocrisy, which is so prevalent in fashionable Christianity of to-day. It is a good book, and while it will offend many, should be read by all."—[The Arena.]

The Morals of Christ. A comparison with the contemporaneous systems of Mosaic, Pharisaic, and Greco-Roman ethics. By Austin Bierbower. Paper, 16mo, 200 pages, 50c.; cloth, $1. "Mr. Bierbower has carefully analyzed the old-world ethical systems which chiefly concern the modern civilized world, and in this book he has so classified the elements revealed by that analysis as to give them a high scientific value. His book is almost as systematic as a treatise upon one of the exact sciences, and stands in fine contrast to the rambling, ethical discussion of which we hear so much and which leads us nowhere."—[Chicago Daily News.]

Liberty and Life. Seventeen discourses on the applications of scientific truth to morals and religion. By E. P. Powell. 12mo, 208 pages; cloth, $1; paper, 50c. "Strong, even bold, essays on ethical and religious subjects. They are the work of a man of vigorous intellect, who has studied the doctrine of evolution long and carefully, and has not found it necessary to abandon all his old reverences. The discourses are full of interest to the casual reader by reason of their fund of anecdote and biographical citation, and to the seeker for religious and moral truth they offer many helps."—[Literary World.]

Evolution and Christianity. A Study. By J. C. F. Grumbine. Cloth, square 18mo, 75 pages, 30c. "Mr. Grumbine's statements are sound and well put. His book is the fruit of wide reading and investigation. It is a helpful one, is thoroughly interesting reading, and its presentation of the relation between evolution and Christianity includes much valuable thought."—[Buffalo Express.]

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

Gems of Thought.

Do not unto others that which you would not they should do unto you; you will conquer anger if you behave yourself toward offenders as you would have others behave themselves toward you when you transgress.—Socrates.

To obtain the remission of his sins a Christian should feel a hearty sorrow for actions he possibly took great pleasure in committing. An act of contrition suffices to make one's peace with God, which is very convenient for Christians who, in spite of their contrition, have no intention of mending their ways.—Voltaire.

No one, who values facts and is acquainted with the method of scientific induction, can have the least doubt that the conception of a special organic force, which produces phenomena of life independently and apart from the universal laws of nature, must be banished from the province of life and science; that nature with its matter and force is in one single indivisible whole, without limits or exceptions; again, that the hard and fast line of division, which some have sought to draw between organic and inorganic, can only be a forced one, and that a difference between the two exists only in the outward form and in the grouping of the material atoms, but by no means in the intrinsic character.—Büchner.

HERETICS escaped the fury of the fiends who loved their enemies, and died naturally in their beds. It would not do for the church to admit that they died peacefully. That would show that religion was not essential at the last moment. Superstition gets its power from the terror of death. It would not do to have the common people understand that a man could deny the Bible—refuse to kiss the cross—contend that humanity was greater than Christ, and then die as sweetly as Torquemada did, after pouring molten lead into the ears of an honest man; or as calmly as Calvin after he had burnt Servetus; or as peacefully as King David after advising with his last breath one son to assassinate another.—Ingersoll.

As diverse as are the systems of the stoics and Lord Bacon, I have never, until recently decided as to their respective merits. Certainly, Jesus taught stoicism by saying, "Take no thought for the morrow;" but Paul agreed with Bacon that men should be "diligent in business." The first system taught uncomplaining and willing submission to the disadvantages of our surroundings, while the latter taught that we must subdue these into subservience to our purposes. I am now satisfied that, as in all issues, there is the "happy medium" long ago expressed in the sentiment, in medio tutissimus ibis, and that the solution requires that the question should be taken by both horns, and that men should subdue their adverse surroundings when they can, as Bacon taught, and submit to them complacently when they cannot subdue them, as the stoics taught.—Charles C. Moore.

THE JUPITER OLYMPUS AT ELIS.

Where is the Jove of Elis,
Which sate adored of old,
By matchless Phidias carved
Of ivory and gold?
From its large brow effusion
Of tranquil thoughts was poured
On warrior, bard, and statesman,
Who silently adored.

Thus throned on high Olympus
The Thunderer Homer saw,
When from his eyes the Muses
The mortal veil did draw.
The mighty poet's vision
The mighty sculptor caught,
And there it sate for ages
Chryselephantine-wrought.

Thus grasped the bolt of terror
The right hand of the god,
Thus rolled the locks ambrosial
To ratify his nod;
Thus perched upon his scepter,
With ample pinions furled,
His regal bird, the eagle,
Gazed o'er the nether world.

Nine hundred years the Grecian
Unto it homage paid,
And e'en the victor Roman
Knelt awe-struck in its shade;
At length fanatic fury
Dethroned the idol vast
And in the smelting furnace
Its rich proportions cast.

The eagle-shaded forehead
Of Zeus no more prevailed;
And in his fallen temples
The smoke of incense failed.
Was lifted o'er the nations
The thorn-encircled brow,
And to the cult of Sorrow,
They're loyal even now.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume. [Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers. [Boston Investigator.]

DEMOCRATS in the House of Representatives announce their determination to secure the repeal of the Federal Election law.

THE business depression seems ending. Factories are resuming work. The revival is attributed to the assurance of the repeal of the silver-purchase act.

THERE is cholera in two or three districts of London, and in over a dozen other parts of England. Rome, Berlin, and Vienna report cases in themselves and other localities in their countries.

THE Senate's delay over the bill repealing the silver-coining act is exasperating most of the people of the country, who desire its passage. Talk of the uselessness of the upper House is being excited, with suggestions of its abolition.

QUEEN VICTORIA on the 11th laid the foundation-stone of a church at Crathie, Scotland. In a speech she declared her warm attachment to the church of Scotland, which, she said, so largely represented the feeling of the people of the country.

THERE is indignation against Rev. Father Smith, of St. Joseph's church, Paterson, N. J., because of his breaking into the rooms of the Catholic Club on Labor day, when they wished to hold a picnic and ball, and tearing down the American flag that they had displayed to advertise the event.

LAST Sunday a papal encyclical was read from all Catholic pulpits of Hungary, in which Leo XIII. admonished the priests and prelates to stand by the church in the fight against the Liberal government, which endeavors to reduce papal influence in the country's administration to the level obtaining in other states—Prussia and France, for instance.

OF the nine thousand religious pilgrims who left Tunis last May for Mecca only half have returned. The others died of cholera. The survivors tell of terrible suffering. One hundred thousand pilgrims gathered on the sacred mount, June 24th to hear a solemn address prior to proceeding to Mecca. Many were starving. The mount was strewn with corpses of victims of the pestilence, among which lay hundreds dying.

EX POSTMASTER-GENERAL WANAMAKER and his double quartet of singers have finished their tour of Cape May county, N. J. They were furnished with a special train by the West Jersey railroad. Wanamaker spoke at every church and urged the people to hold fast to the gospel and called on all believers to be more vigilant in the work of the church. He said religion was of more importance than the great questions of the day, not even excepting labor, tariff, or finance.

A DISPATCH from Rome gives an account of a riot in the town of Sulmona, in the province of Aquila, Italy, which originated in the appearance of cholera at that place. A number of cases of the disease had occurred in the town, and as a precautionary measure the officials attempted to stop a religious procession. This led to serious trouble, and an encounter between the military and police and the paraders was the result. During the fight a captain of the chasseurs was killed and several gendarmes were wounded.

WITHIN the past few weeks Gov. Claude Matthews, of Indiana, has received a number of letters from individuals in different parts of the state warning him that the members of the Catholic church are preparing to rebel against the constituted authorities, and asking that he at once take steps to suppress any outbreak. To the majority of the letters the governor has not replied, but one from R. N. Moulton, of Decatur county, he answered to the effect that the rumor of Catholic rebellion is false. The letters arise from American Protective Association agitation.

At noon on the 16th the 100,000 or 150,000 people who have been waiting on the boundary of the Cherokee Strip were admitted. The territory thus opened is about 200 miles long by 56 miles wide. It covers a little more than 11,000 square miles, or between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 acres. It will afford at the most farms of 160 acres for 40,000 or 50,000 persons. Much of the territory is well watered and exceedingly fertile, with a climate as nearly perfect as can be found anywhere on earth. There was a mad race for claims. There was land for less than half. Not only the disappointed, but those who located claims, will suffer extremely for water, food, and shelter, and a number will inevitably perish. It is a noteworthy fact that this is the last piece of public land, of any account, available for farming.

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1893, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically united the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Freethought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Remsburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN:

WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Remsburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Remsburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

At the Woman's Congress at Chicago Helen Gardener delivered as an address one of the chapters of this book. The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joslyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage as opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

Four Hundred Years of Freethought.

The World's Fair marks the completion of four centuries of this continent's known history. These years have been a warfare between savagery and civilization in thought as well as in material things. From the hanging of witches on Boston common and whipping of women naked through Boston's streets to the holding of the International Congress of Freethinkers is a long way. Liberals can celebrate the event as perhaps no other class can do, for in the past they have suffered much.

Nor is this Four Hundred Years of Freethought complete without recognition of our European brethren. They blazed the way, contending in their own countries for the same liberty of speech the American desired to enjoy. In a large measure the battle has been won. A bare quarter of a century ago even the man who proposed to hold a religious congress where Mohammedan and Catholic, Buddhist and Protestant, could stand upon the same platform and defend their creeds would have been deemed a proper inmate for an insane asylum. But Chicago has seen it in this culmination of Four Hundred Years of Freethought, and, cause for the greatest rejoicing, the religious congress is succeeded by a Congress of Freethinkers, and there is no inquisition to follow, no dungeons for the audiences, no racks nor flames for the speakers.

It seems to us a fitting time to call again to mind the noble men and women who have lived and worked, and some of them died, that the heretics of the world may meet in peace. So we print this week the portraits of some of these. A few of them are still living and joining in the celebration. The others have passed to their rest, but living yet in the grateful memories of those to whom they have given freedom. Let us treasure the lessons of their lives and emulate their example.

There is no need of biographies of these heroes. Those who have died have left their records in the world's history. Those yet with us are making history, and happily the time has not come to sum up their work.

How Blasphemy Fares in New Jersey.

The whole of Hunterdon county, New Jersey, last week was torn with excitement over the horrid suspicion that they had in their midst a blasphemer. The dire word had gone forth that one of their inhabitants was that infamous creature, a man whose mind was so constituted that he could not accept as conclusively the evidence for religion, and who therefore naturally treated it with levity whenever occasion called just as he did anything else. Dr. W. W. Hawke, a young dentist, was this hateful viper, and the town of Flemington the spot in the Christian bosom on which he had chosen to coil his venomous shape. The man of God of that hamlet had done his duty of denouncing the blasphemer, and the latter thereupon brought suit for $1,000 damages. Charles A. Skillman, of Lambertville, one of the oldest practitioners in the state, opened the case. He told the jurymen they had to deal with an unusual case. In a practice of more than forty years he had not in either civil or criminal proceedings known of a case in which blasphemy figured, so degrading it was and so much moral turpitude did it involve. Mr. Skillman then read the complaint. The first count was to the effect that Pastor Sagebeer before preaching his sermon had told Miss Bertha Rittenhouse and others that the doctor had been present at a mock prayer-meeting, where whisky had been drunk in mockery of the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, mock prayers had been said, and the long-meter doxology had been sung. "They are blasphemers," the complaint alleges Pastor Sagebeer said to Miss Rittenhouse, "and you must not associate with them." If the charges against Dr. Hawke were true, said Mr. Skillman, he ought to be hunted out of town. If not true, the jury must give him a substantial verdict. Mr. Skillman defined blasphemy and told the jury the penalty in New Jersey for speaking evil of the deity or willfully and maliciously attempting to lessen the reverence for God or his attributes, or to weaken regard for the Christian religion was a $200 fine or imprisonment at hard labor for twelve months, or both. "Why, up to 1813," said he, "blasphemy in Scotland, under certain circumstances, was punishable with death."

After divers witnesses had testified, Dr. Hawke took the stand and testified that when he had asked Pastor Sagebeer for a retraction the divine had said that he would not take what Hawke said as evidence of his innocence, as he would not believe a blasphemer. Further, when Dr. Hawke threatened a lawsuit the pastor said that he courted a suit, as it would make him the most widely known young sensational preacher in the state.

One of the rulings interposed by Judge Abbett was: "A slander is never privileged, even though it come from a minister of the gospel, and I will so charge the jury." By the judge's use of the word "even," we are reminded of the fact that a leniency is shown the faults of preachers that is not given to those of other persons. They are, such remarks indicate, privileged to do things of a certain degree of badness anyway, though perhaps not quite allowed the one indulgence of slander. When the alleged drinking of whisky was brought under question, the judge put in: "That's immaterial. Drinking whisky is no crime in New Jersey."

Several witnesses testified to such fearful sights as the beholding of Dr. Hawke, Tom Brown, Frank Gray, and two strangers drinking from a long-necked black bottle, and the hearing of them sing, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and the doxology. A witness testified that the singing was very fine and that he had gone to his room to listen to it and be soothed thereby. Many a church attendant will, we fear, on reading this heave a sigh at the contrast with his own experiences, and wonder why the vocalistic dentist should receive upbraiding instead of honor.

Lawyer Lindabury said that he would prove beyond a doubt that the young men had in a drunken, riotous, scoffing, and blasphemous manner sang, "Jesus, Lover of My Soul," "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and the long-meter doxology, taking frequent drinks of whisky between. "If such things," said Mr. Lindabury, "can go unrebuked in this world there would be little for Christian ministers to do, and the Christian churches had better close up."

The verdict was one of six cents' damages for Dr. Hawke. Whether the accusation of the preacher that Dr. Hawke did do and say the things alleged was true, and, consequently, whether this award of damages was in its smallness just, we cannot say. We relate the matter only as an instance of the power which Christians still possess, in the state of New Jersey, to injure whomsoever has the brains to despise their creeds and the boldness to ridicule what he despises.

Hostility to Education.

A Catholic writer has collected instances of the Protestant church's opposition to education. There are also plentiful collections by Protestants of the Catholics' hostility thereto. We wish that Catholic and Protestant would fight each other over the point till there should ensue a mutual destruction like that of the Kilkenny cats.

This Catholic exposure of the Protestant hindrance to education opens with pointing out that Hallam, in his introduction to the "Literature of Europe," blames Luther for the general stagnation of literature. We are next reminded that Schlegel, in his "Philosophy of History," speaks of "the truly barbarous era of the Reformation." Likewise, Erasmus, in his "Letters" (59), says: "Luther wrote that 'all science, speculativ as well as practical, is damnable. Speculativ sciences are sins and errors;'" and Melancthon, Luther's disciple, "condemned public schools." Erasmus again says: "Wherever Lutheranism reigns, there literature perishes." The Anabaptists in Germany and the followers of Knox destroyed all libraries in religious houses. Nearly all the manuscript histories of England were destroyed by the Reformers. Gordon, of Rothesy, tells of Scotland in the days of Knox that learning was decried. Laing, speaking of the eighteenth century, says: "In every species of improvement and in the arts and refinement of social life, we must, unfortunately, consider Scotland as a century behind the period." And Scotland was then dominated and guided in every department of life by the Protestant clergy. As late as 1575 there had not been a printed edition of the Reform Bible published in Scotland. In Buckle's "History of Civilization" we learn that "the Scottish kirk had become a bye-word and a reproach among educational men." Some of the Scottish divines wrote against education. When the famous chief, Walter Scott, of Harden, was married, we are told in Chambers' Annals: "That the contract was signed by a notary, because none of the parties could sign their names." This Catholic arraigner next tells us to look in Chambers' Annals for accounts of the deplorable ignorance of the Presbyterian divines of Scotland, as shown in connection with witchcraft and other absurdities." In Germany, Erasmus tells us, the schools were neglected, the churches ruined, and fanaticism pervaded the people. Our writer now quotes: "In Germany, the war of the peasants sent more than a hundred thousand of those poor deluded beings to the grave, more than twice that number of manuscripts were destroyed during that commotion; and the Thirty Years' War completed the work of destruction and left Germany almost a dreary wilderness." The circumstances under which the extensive library at Munster was destroyed by the Anabaptists recur here to mind. Rothman, one of their leaders, incited them to its destruction by the same argument which the Caliph Omar used in justification of the destruction of the Alexandrian library. "If conformable to the Bible, they were useless, and if not conformable they were hurtful, and in either case to be destroyed." Thus, cries our Catholic collaborer in anti-Protestant propaganda, one of the noblest collections of Germany perished at the hands of Baptist fanatics.

And in the same manner, too, many of the noblest collections of learning perished at the hands of Catholic fanatics. Both the Protestant and the Catholic faiths are, by their essential nature, at deadly enmity with knowledge. Each lives solely by the ignorance of its devotees. Each exists because the masses are so ignorant of the natural causes which produce all things that they believe the clergy's lie that supernatural causes produce them, and give money to that clergy to use their influence favorably upon those preternatural agencies. If the masses were instructed as to natural causes that have already been discovered, and made acquainted with the axiom of science that all things for which such causes have not been discovered still possess them, then not a penny would cut the cobweb on the contribution-box.

Why the Clergy Represent Man Helpless.

Rabbi Wise, of a Jewish congregation in New York city, has preached a sermon on the subject, dear to every sacerdotal heart, of the ignorance and helplessness of man. After praising the achievements of man's genius as seen at the World's Fair, he changes his tone and croaks:

"But, behold, certain natural phenomena make their appearance and teach us the lesson that our much praised knowledge has its limitations. Medical science has undoubtedly made rapid progress. Step by step it battles with the angel of death, but what do we see? From the far East comes a small speck, detectable only through the microscope. Science calls it the comma bacillus, and the whole world, with all its power, intelligence, might, and inventive genius, stands aghast and in abject terror before the approaching peril—helpless and dejected. Aye, the secret things belong to the Lord our God."

The rabbi then pictures corresponding discomfitures of mankind by financial disaster, storm, and so on. After each he exhorts us to fly from man who cannot save to the bosom of God.

But not the slightest use in doing so can be pointed out by all the rabbis in the world. Even supposing that man cannot save, God certainly can not and does not. Not one case of his doing so was ever known. And the truth is, man can save. He has already saved us from countless ills. He has saved us from unnumbered diseases that cut short our lives when we knew of nothing better than to take the advice of rabbis and priests and appeal to their God. And he will very soon, at the present rate of medical progress, have learned how to save us from many diseases more. In finance man has saved us from much. The present monetary troubles, great as they are, do not equal those of former ages. And science will yet do away with such as we have now. Man has, too, averted a large part of the dangers proceeding from storms. And here likewise he will do better yet. Man does all, God nothing.

The reason that the preacher belittles the province of the known, and magnifies that of the unknown, is that other professions deal with the known while he pretends to have influence over the unknown, and he wishes to divert the people's money from the pockets of the other professions into his own.

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store. Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

We desire to call the attention of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benefits of subscribing to the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. The yearly subscription is only $3, and subscribers to the Library receive a paper-bound copy of each book issued in it; or, if they desire the books in cloth binding, subscribers can remit the difference in price between paper and cloth binding, and get the books in the latter shape. So far this year subscribers to the Library have received "Paine Vindicated," by Colonel Ingersoll, price 15 cents; the "Creation of God," by Dr. Hartmann, price 50 cents; the "Resurrection of Jesus," by Don Allen, price 40 cents; "Crimes of Preachers," price 25 cents; the "Handbook of Freethought," by W. S. Bell, price 50 cents; "Religion a Curse," by S. P. Putnam, price 25 cents; "Design Argument Fallacies," price 15 cents; "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," price 25 cents, and "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" price 50 cents. Other books besides are in preparation. One of these, we may mention, is "Pleasure and Progress," by A. M. Lorentz, LL.B., of which further notice will shortly be made. Send $3 and receive at once the books already published, and, as they appear, those which will be published between now and January, '94.

Colonel Ingersoll Expresses His Views of the Parliament of Religions.

Although he was not invited to take part in its deliberations, there is probably no man in this country who is watching more closely the proceedings of the Parliament of Religions in Chicago than Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the leading American Agnostic, says the Herald. A reporter for that paper had a talk with him last week about this meeting in which so many churchmen of all denominations have figured.

"The Parliament of Religions," the reporter volunteered, "was called with a view to discussing the great religions of the world on the broad platform of tolerance. Supposing this to have been accomplished, what effect is it likely to have on the future of creeds?"

"It was a good thing," answered Colonel Ingersoll, "to get the representatives of all creeds to meet and tell their beliefs. The tendency, I think, is to do away with prejudice, with provincialism, with egotism. We know the difference between the great religions, so far as belief is concerned, amounts to but little. Their gods have different names, but in other respects they differ but little. They are all cruel and ignorant."

"Do you think likely," the scribe asked, "that the time is coming when all the religions of the world will be treated with the liberality that is now characterizing the attitude of one sect to another in Christendom?"

"Yes, because I think that all religions will be found to be of equal authority, and because I believe that the supernatural will be discarded and that man will give up his vain and useless efforts to get back of nature—to answer the questions of whence and whither. As a matter of fact, the various sects do not love one another. The keenest hatred is religious hatred. The most malicious malice is found in the hearts of those who love their enemies."

"Bishop Newman, in replying to a learned Buddhist at the Parliament of Religions, said that Buddhism had given to the world no helpful literature, no social system, and no heroic virtues. Is this true?" was the next question.

"Bishop Newman is a very prejudiced man," said the colonel. "Probably he got his information from the missionaries! Buddha was undoubtedly a great teacher. Long before Christ lived Buddha taught the brotherhood of man. He said that intelligence was the only lever capable of raising mankind. His followers, to say the least of them, are as good as the followers of Christ. Bishop Newman is a Methodist—a follower of John Wesley—and he has the prejudices of the sect to which he belongs. We must remember that all prejudices are honest."

"Is Christian society, or rather society in Christian countries, cursed with fewer robbers, assassins, and thieves proportionately than countries where 'heathen' religions predominate?"

"I think not," said Colonel Ingersoll. "I do not believe that there are more lynchings, more mob murders in India or Turkey, or Persia than in some Christian states of the great republic. Neither will you find more train robbers, more forgers, more thieves in heathen lands than in Christian countries. Here the jails are full, the penitentiaries are crowded and the hangmen are busy. All over Christendom, as many assert, crime is on the increase, going hand in hand with poverty. The truth is, that some of the wisest and best men are filled with apprehension for the future, but I believe in the race and have confidence in man."

"How can society be so reconstructed that all this horrible suffering resultant from poverty and its natural associate, crime, may be abolished, or at least reduced to a minimum?" I asked.

"In the first place we should stop supporting the useless. The burdens of superstition should be taken from the shoulders of industry. In the next place men should stop bowing to wealth instead of worth. Men should be judged by what they do, by what they are, instead of by the property they have. Only those able to raise and educate children should have them. Children should be better born—better educated. The process of regeneration will be slow, but it will be sure. The religion of our day is supported by the worst, by the most dangerous people in society. I do not allude to murderers or burglars, or even to the little thieves. I mean those who debauch courts and legislatures and elections—those who make millions by legal fraud."

"Is it possible for men to be good and honest without the help of Christianity?"

"Christianity is not a help," was the colonel's reply. "Christianity offers to sell crime on a credit. It says to the bank cashier: 'Be honest. Don't you steal a cent, but if you do steal the entire bank God will forgive you in Canada just as quickly as in the United States.' Christianity does not make men good. Good men have given Christianity the good reputation it has."

"What do you think of the Theosophists? Are they sincere—have they any real basis for their psychological theories?"

"The Theosophists may be sincere. I do not know. But I am perfectly satisfied that their theories are without any foundation in fact—that their doctrines are as unreal as their 'astral bodies,' and as absurd as a contradiction in mathematics. We have had vagaries and theories enough. We need the religion of the real, the faith that rests on fact. Let us turn our attention to this world—the world in which we live."

Before our talk began Colonel Ingersoll had taken up a pamphlet in which he was soon absorbed. He read on to the last page and exclaimed:

The fellow who wrote that gives Bishop Potter some hard blows."

I looked at him questioningly.

"It's just this way," said the colonel. "Bishop Potter, in advocating the opening of the World's Fair on Sundays, dubbed the fourth commandment 'a venerable relic' and Sabbath observance as 'a scarcely less venerable tradition.' Now this hardy pamphleteer pertinently asks; 'Why did Bishop Potter for so long read the commandment to the people of Grace church, New York, as one of God's commandments? Does he not now require it to be read by the clergy of his diocese? Has it been stricken from the decalogue in the new prayer book? And are all the commandments omitted as being, like it, only 'venerable conceptions' and 'traditions?' I guess those are pretty tough questions for Brother Potter to answer."

Notes on the Congress of Religions.

The Congress of Religions is like the Midway Plaisance. It is a curiosity shop. It has not the slightest practical value. It gives no light on any subject whatsoever. It is simply a gush about God, and makes one smile. All confer in this grand conglomeration provided they will not attack the Christian religion. They must give the good points of their own religion in a neighborly sort of way. It is to be a feast of sweetmeats, and every speaker must devote himself to taffy. He must not refer to superstition, tyranny, or persecutions or bloody massacres, or any wrong thing that has ever been done in the name of religion. Religion is the fetish and all bow down before it. No matter what he is, if Christian, Jew, Mohammedan, Buddhist, Free Religionist, Unitarian, Patagonian, Feeji Islander, or Esquimaux, if he will only proclaim the sacred name of religion he is all right. He can say his say, and utter all sorts of notions about God, but he must not say there is no God. That is forbidden ground. He must not attack anybody else's notion of God. He must speak in dulcet tones and flatter every deity, and only by innuendo give the preference to his own deity. Of course the out-and-out Freethinker has no place in a congress of this kind. The Atheist is tabooed. The scientific man is outlawed. Faint or dense the cloud of theology envelops it all. It is permeated from beginning to end with faith. It is the place for the believer, but not for the man of facts and the investigator.

Well, there are many ways of looking at this nondescript congress. It is a manifold affair. Like the many mirrors in the Moorish palace, it presents a bewildering variety, and looks to the casual observer much more immense than it is.

From the Unitarian standpoint it is a pretty good scheme. It emphasizes the idea that all religions have the same origin, the same purpose, and on the whole are equally natural and equally good. It is a triumph for the liberal Christian element. It is anti-orthodox from its very nature. It is a deadly blow to the old-fashioned ideas. If Christianity is only a natural religion, then Calvinism goes by the board. If Christianity is not a supernatural religion based on a miracle and a special divine revelation; if it must take its chances with all other religions, and appeal only to reason; then where is its supremacy? All those who participate in this congress practically renounce the old orthodoxy, and align themselves somewhat with human progress. They really take the side of the devil and are willing, with Adam and Eve, to pluck the fruit of the tree of knowledge. The pure Theist has won the day. He no longer needs to be a Christian in order to enter the charmed circle. The lion and the lamb can lie down together provided they both have an abiding faith in the "goodness of God."

So we might say that on the lines of a liberal and progressive faith there is quite an advance. The growls of ancient superstition are now succeeded by the mellow accents of a polite recognition of each other's pet belief.

But all is not rose-colored. I opine that this Congress would be like the old church councils, and there would be a knock-down and a drag-out if it were not that the civilization of the age keeps a steady watch over the proceedings through the agency of the lynx-eyed newspapers. It won't do to break out and violate the courtesies of the occasion unless Joseph Cook is on the platform and the rampage, for there is no use to try and make Joseph Cook a Chesterfield in debate. Still there is an undercurrent of bitter feeling. The good old orthodox soul is horrified at the idea that the Jew or the Mohammedan has anything to say in behalf of his religion. The harmony is all on the outside.

The hand-greetings are pretty cold all round. There is much mental reserve. Every religionist is on the lookout that no one gets the drop on him. There is a great lack of sincerity and openheartedness. There is a concealed warfare. At times it is impossible to prevent the groans and hisses of contending parties, and the police are on hand to prevent further displays. I don't think this Congress will add to the harmony of Christian sects or of the religions of the world. After the Congress is over there will be a more furious battle than ever. I am glad of it. It would be exceedingly dangerous to the progress of mankind if all the religions of the world should agree. There would be a mighty poor chance for the radical Freethinker if this should happen. The salvation of science lies in the fact that religions do not combine. Religion, if thus harmonious, would rule the world everywhere with a rod of iron.

There seems to be a sort of subtle conspiracy all round among the religious people to shut off Freethought entirely. They don't want it. The Atheist and the Agnostic need not apply. There must be no discussion of the God question. Believe or be damned is the shibboleth. The Freethinkers could not even have a hall of their own without a padlock on their lips. The Free Religionist, the Unitarian, the Mohammedan, the Catholic, the Presbyterian, by universal combination might make it pretty hard for the Atheist. They would ostracize him to their heart's content, and God would have the glory. It is rather difficult now to be an outspoken Atheist; but the difficulty would be enormously increased if the religious element should really combine into one vast whole. Fortunately, those who do believe in God do not agree and will not agree; if they did, I am of the opinion that Freethought would be absolutely crushed out. I am somewhat afraid of these Theistic fellows, no matter how mild they are in appearance. They have the disease, and there is no knowing how violently it might break forth. But so long as they constantly quarrel about God, the world is free from a tremendous intellectual tyranny. God is at the bottom of it all, and if God is saved, then despotism will still flaunt its banners. That is why the far-seeing Catholic joins in this religious Congress. This is why he foregathers with the Free Religionist and Unitarian. With them he is defending the outworks of his mighty citadel. These men, liberal and progressive as they are, make alliance with the pope. The pope is no fool. He understands that his throne is built on Theism, and every argument for Theism is, in the long run, an argument for the pope. While people believe in God, so long will many believe in the pope; for, though every Theist is not a Catholic, still he furnishes the logical foundation of the Catholic church, for Theism is faith and only faith. The main argument for God's existence presented to this Congress is, God is thinkable, therefore he exists. If that is not faith I do not know what faith is, and it is that kind of faith which subjects reason to sentiment. What limits can there be to human credulity when it is asserted that the think-ableness of a thing is a proof of its actual being? And yet learned doctors argue that there is a God, not on the ground of fact, but on the ground that there is an idea of God in the human mind. I must confess that I am impatient of these frivolities. I would smile at them but for the danger that is in them, for broaden religion and Theism as you will the seed is there of mental servitude, and it will produce its perilous fruit. Is the tyranny of Theism simply as such any better than the tyranny of a pope?

The Congress of Religions is a failure so far as producing harmony is concerned; and in the interest of human liberty it is better thus to be. There is, I admit, one good thing in theologians—that is, pugnacity; and I suppose that pugnacity and dogmatism go together. Theologians will fight and fight about trifles, and they fight one another with delightful asperity. Keep it up, I say. It is the everlasting fight of the Kilkenny cats, and it is the salvation of the world. If theology could for once present a united front, then farewell to freedom. But theology is broken into a thousand camps; every ism floats its flag, and hence truth and liberty have some chance.

Bicker away, O theologians! Bark and bite at one another. Quarrel about every creed under the sun. Dispute about the trinity, hell-fire, atonement, foreordination, predestination, and infant damnation. Excommunicate one another. It's the best thing for man that you don't agree. Keep on damning one another. It saves the world from being damned by you.

FOUR HUNDRED YEARS OF FREETHOUGHT.

Some of the World's Freethinkers who lived and labored, and some of them died, that we of to-day may exist without fear of the dungeon and the rack.

The Annual Convention of the Canadian Secular Union.

The Convention of 1893, says Secular Thought, may fairly be said to have been the most interesting and successful one of recent years. Although several of the older members were absent, the attendance at the Sunday sessions was large and enthusiastic; and the business accomplished will cause it to be remembered as the starting-point of at least two great agencies toward the success of our cause—the establishment of a funeral fund, and the appointment of a committee to arrange for the permanent and regular support of Secular Thought, and for the payment of a traveling or visiting lecturer, who will thus be enabled to make visits to all parts of Canada where lectures may be desired.

On Saturday evening the first session was called to order at about half-past 8 o'clock, at 35 Adelaide street East. In the absence of the president, the vice-president of the local Secular Society was voted to the chair, and he at once called upon the secretary to read the president's address, which was as follows:

TO THE CANADIAN SECULAR UNION AT THE ANNUAL CONVENTION, Friends and Fellow-workers: Prevented from being at your Convention by the search for secular wealth in the mountains of British Columbia, I send greeting to the friends assembled in council, and hope that the spirit of reason and of progress will inspire your deliberations and lead onward in the advancement of Liberal opinions.

During the past year we have witnessed at large most encouraging signs of the evolution of Freethought. The general sentiment of civilized communities is steadily drifting away from orthodox religious beliefs, and heresy is even daring to lift its head in the pulpit. A few preachers have ventured to hint at some of the truths that Thomas Paine boldly declared a hundred years ago, and these glories in persecution as advanced thinkers. The agitation of the Sunday opening of the World's Fair has done much to educate the people, and we may reasonably claim that the principles of Secularism have been more widely accepted in consequence.

Among our greatest immediate causes for gratification have been the successful tour of Mr. Ellis across the continent, the sustaining of the issue of Secular Thought, and the passage of the Oaths Laws by the Dominion Parliament.

Mr. Ellis has given a stimulus to Secular agitation in many places by his instructive addresses; and aided by his talented daughter he has sent out every week by his journal a valuable supply of information and argument that must have had an effective influence upon the thoughts of its readers.

Since the 1st of July of this year it has been possible for any person who has conscientious scruples against taking oaths to make affirmation in all cases under control of the laws of the Dominion. It is desirable for the sake of influence that every Secularist should bear this in mind, and always refuse to take the oath, thus testifying against the superstition involved in that custom.

Of future work I may say that we hope to secure a change in the oaths laws of the province of Quebec. A commission is now engaged in the revision of the statutes of Quebec, and I have taken measures to secure the consideration of a change in the disgraceful edicts that at present disqualify Agnostics or Atheists from testifying in the courts of this province. Several circumstances that it is not prudent to mention just yet lead me to believe that our ends will be quietly but effectively gained, as was done in the case of the Dominion Parliament, without exciting the opposition of bigotry or the vested interests of the clergy. When I assumed the presidency of the Secular Union I marked out this reform as the one to which I would devote my special efforts, and I am gratified to feel that my term of office has been signalized by the culmination of this long struggle, which so many earnest and faithful workers have aided in the past, and which now in the fullness of time brings one more trophy to the cause of Rationalism.

We hope that Secular Thought may be upheld by worthy financial support, and that its sphere of usefulness may be enlarged. As the only professed Freethought paper in Canada, it ought to be sustained. The press is fast superseding in influence both the pulpit and the platform, and it is very desirable that our society, in connection with the paper, should secure the broadcast issue of judiciously selected tracts and pamphlets. A fund should be provided by which the free circulation of tracts upon a given subject could be secured at an opportune time and place when public opinion and action might be influenced favorably thereby. A bureau of literature, under the direction of a small committee, might at comparatively small cost circulate Liberal opinions throughout the country and affect more minds than could possibly be reached by any practicable system of lecturing. Such work as was done by Mr. John Helm in sending Mr. Allen Pringle's admirable pamphlet upon "The Bible in the Schools" to every teacher in the Dominion is an example of the sort of effort that the times demand, and which should be taken up systematically. Earnest Liberals in every town should be supplied periodically with matter for free distribution, besides making all possible uses of the mails to reach legislators and known persons of influence. I would like to see a fund raised for this purpose.

I should be glad to hear that some efforts are being made to invigorate the Toronto Society, and trust any plans put forward with that object will meet with your hearty coöperation. All around us we see signs of the liberalization of thought and the secularization of action. Our only course is to persevere in contributing our efforts to the grand forces of the age, which through education in natural science and the laws of evolution are gradually emancipating the human mind from those beliefs in supernaturalism which have hitherto held the human race in bondage to the altar and the throne. I expect to be present at the International Congress of Freethought at Chicago in October, and will speak for the Canadian aspects of Secularism. For some years I have been honored with the presidency of the Canadian Secular Union, and shall be pleased and proud to serve yet another year in that capacity should it be the general desire; but I feel it to be fitting that others should receive the recognition of their zeal and devotion by election to this office, and I shall be heartily in accord with any choice that the Convention may make.

I remain, with cordial good wishes,

Faithfully yours,

ROBERT C. ADAMS.

Kaslo, B. C., Aug. 18, 1893.

At the conclusion of the address, the secretary gave a synopsis of the business which had been accomplished during the past year, calling particular attention to the clauses in the recently passed act of the Dominion legislature by which anyone having "conscientious scruples" against taking the oath in a court of justice or otherwise is allowed to affirm without being subjected to any inquisition as to his religious opinions.

The secretary then gave a short account of his lecturing tour in the spring of the year.

Referring to the Sunday-car contest in Toronto, he said there were two well-marked features in it: the almost total abandonment by the intelligent ministers of the biblical argument in favor of the old-time Sabbath observance; and an emphatic declaration by the workingmen that they were able and determined to look after their own interests without the intervention of the clericals.

Of the matters to be brought before them, the establishment of a burial club in connection with the Union was a very important one, and he hoped it would be discussed and some plan adopted.

An effort would, if possible, be made to establish a Sunday-school during the next season; and the secretary read an item from Sweden, recording the fact that the Sunday-school attached to the Stockholm Freethought Society had fifty-seven children attending regularly, to show how backward Canadian Secularists were.

After some little discussion on various matters mentioned in the report, the chairman called for the next order of business, and the letters were read by the secretary from various friends who could not attend.

The following committees were then appointed:

On Resolutions: Messrs. Kendall, Armstrong, Lockie, and Ellis.

On Secular Thought and Propagandism: Messrs. Lockie, Middleton, Wilson, Risser, W. C. Hay, and Ellis.

The Convention then adjourned.

SUNDAY MORNING.

At the meeting of the Convention on Sunday morning, Mr. J. Lockie was elected to the chair, and at once called for nominations for the office of president. Capt. R. C. Adams, of Montreal, was reelected by acclamation, as were also the retiring secretary and treasurer. After several nominations had been made for members of the executive committee, it was moved and seconded that the whole of the executive committee be reelected. This was carried unanimously. The present staff of officers is therefore as follows: President, Capt. Robert C. Adams, Montreal; secretary, J. Spencer Ellis, Toronto; treasurer, A. Earsman, Toronto; executive committee, Messrs. George Martin, Montreal; W. Macdonnell, Lindsay; J. Lockie, Waterloo; A. Roe, Wingham; E. Duval, Hamilton; and J. Taylor, J. A. Risser, F. Armstrong, and E. J. Kendall, of Toronto.

The secretary then reported the following resolutions from the committee on resolutions, and the chairman put them to the meeting:

Resolved, That this Convention, while regretting the unavoidable absence of its worthy president in the West, desires to thank him for his able address; for the continued energy and ability he has displayed in fulfilling the duties of his office, and for the exertions he has made in favor of a liberal improvement in the law as to the taking of oaths; and, while congratulating him upon the success already attained, as shown by the clauses embodied in the Dominion statutes, hopes that he may be enabled to continue those efforts until the statute-book of Quebec also is relieved of this objectionable trace of a barbarous superstition. The Convention trusts he may for many years to come be enabled to carry at its head the flag of freedom and progress.

Resolved, That this Union desires, through the medium of its late respected and eminent leader, Mr. Charles Watts, to convey to its fellow-workers in the Liberal cause in England its great appreciation of the efforts made during the past year by their able army of advocates headed by Mr. G. W. Foote, Mr. G. J. Holyoake, and Mr. Charles Watts, and trusts soon to hear of the completion of the arrangements being made to establish the headquarters of English Freethought in London on a grand and permanent foundation.

The resolutions were carried unanimously.

Mr. G. W. Hay then gave some interesting reminiscences of his experience with ministers and others in propagandist work. He urged the necessity of more care being taken in the training of the minds of children in Liberal ideas. As showing the deeply rooted bigotry of some Christians, he recalled a case where he had acted as chairman at a teetotal meeting. The next morning, at a meeting of ladies, it was suggested that the floor should be scrubbed where he had stood.

Mr. Middleton spoke of the late Sunday-car contest, and said the World deserved the support of all Liberals for the stand it had taken, notwithstanding they might not approve its politics.

Mr. Moffatt, of Orillia, thought it would not be long before Toronto people would be able to ride on cars on Sunday, and he hoped country people would be able to come into town as freely on Sunday as on other days. He had seen a great change in public sentiment during recent years. Formerly he had met much opposition; but he had been lately elected to office, though he had been opposed on the ground of his infidelity, and to-day many of his former opponents were very friendly with him.

Mr. James Wilson, of Attwood, said it was undoubtedly the fact that public opinion was becoming more liberal. He was once a leader in the church. When he left the church, a petition was signed by a large number to prevent his acting elsewhere; but when it came to the heads of the church, who knew him intimately, they refused to sign it.

Mr. Lockie said he had the honor of being publicly prayed for in the churches; but, strange to say, both those churches—one on each side of his house—had been struck by lightning, while his house had escaped. Mr. Hodgins suggested that that might be due to the fact that Mr. Lockie paid his taxes. Mr. Moffatt thought all the churches, notwithstanding their profession of faith in divine providence, took occasion to insure, and all the ministers he knew were heavily insured. He thought a great need among Freethinkers was more social intercourse.

Mr. Ellis suggested that next year the Convention should open with a banquet, which would perhaps be one means of helping to attain this end.

Mr. Stewart recalled a convention of thirty years ago in Scotland. There were a dozen of them, and everyone of them had been imprisoned for thirty days for lending Paine's "Age of Reason."

Mr. Middleton spoke of the increasing liberalism of the parsons. A year ago he had induced Rev. Mr. Johnson, of Lindsay, who had been a Sunday-observance fanatic, to read Mr. Macdonnell's "Day of Rest," and he had not said a word about Sunday since.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON.

Soon after 2 o'clock, Mr. J. Lockie again took the chair and called upon Mr. Lemay, Toronto, to read the paper which was the first in order on the program, "Religion in the Province of Quebec." At the conclusion of the paper, which was received with many marks of approval, Mr. Stewart gave some of his experiences with the Canadian Institute. Mr. G. W. Hay said there was no question that Quebec was the most priest-ridden country in the world. Mr. Ellis spoke of the recent contest between the Canada Revue and the clergy, and thought Ontario Secularists should aid the Quebec Liberals whenever possible. Mr. Moffat said it was a fact that, whenever Catholics left the church they almost invariably became Freethinkers.

The chairman then called upon Miss Hepburn to read her paper upon "The Position of Woman," which was received with frequent applause.

The chairman then called on Mr. Denton to read his paper on the formation of a burial society.

The secretary moved that a committee be appointed to take the matter in hand and carry it out—the committee to consist of Messrs. Risser, Armstrong, Denton, Taylor, J. S. Ellis, McClement, and Densmore. The motion was carried.

Mr. Watts then gave a brief address, comprising a short sketch of the history of Secularism in England and its present aspect; and he delivered a message of greeting from Mr. G. W. Foote and Mr. G. J. Holyoake, both of whom regretted their inability to be present at the Convention. After some further discussion, in which Messrs. Hay, Ellis, Burnell, Watts, Hepburn, and the chairman took part, the meeting adjourned until 7 P.M. at the Academy of Music.

The audience began to arrive at the doors of the Academy of Music before 7 o'clock, and at that time there was a considerable crowd waiting for the doors to open. When Mr. Watts walked on to the stage, accompanied by Mr. Lockie (who had been appointed chairman), the auditorium was well filled, and many who arrived late could find only standing room. Mr. Watts's lecture was received by the immense audience with all the old-time enthusiasm.

Items of Foreign News Interesting to Freethinkers.

La Antorcha del Libre Pensamiento is the name of a new-born Freethought journal in Havana, Cuba. We send our fraternal greeting and best wishes.

The editor of El Progreso, the Spanish Free-thought monthly published in New York city, and the editors of Las Dominicales, of Madrid, have been excommunicated and their respective journals put on the black list by the bishop of Popayán, Columbia. Both journals are in a prosperous state as yet.

But It Was Premature Rolling.

Joseph Cook says that when the news came to him of the closing of the World's Fair gates on Sunday he went out on the Dakota prairie and rolled for joy. Mr. Cook says the victory "illustrates the value of a vertebrate Christianity as opposed to a lax, moluscan Liberalism." —Michigan Christian Advocate.

Friends of freedom, how do you like it? Is there not need of union? Is the Freethought Federation in vain?

Once more unto the breach, dear friends, once more;
Or close up the wall with our Freethought dead.

Ridiculous Bigotry at the Fair.

From the Detroit Evening News.

After all, the liberalizing tendencies of the World's Fair in the way of religious presentations does not extend to the Freethinkers, who have been denied the use of the hall in which the religious congresses are being held in Chicago. It would seem that where every phase of thought on the end of man and the means of attaining it, from devotion to the tenets of Roman Catholicism to the worship of idols or the wrapping of one's self up in the dreamy philosophies of the East, was permitted, there should have been room for the presentation of the opinions of people who have no belief in these systems, but who have on the contrary some reasons of their own for disbelief in all of them. The contention of President Bonney, who runs the religious sideshow of the Fair, that he does not propose to allow any set of people who will criticize the church to drag the name of the creator in the mire, is petty. The church has been given some pretty hard raps in the congresses already held, and for its own good, by its own friends in many cases. To presume that the Freethinkers, who probably have as many persons of a philosophic turn and of exact expression in their ranks as any of the other schools, cannot hold a congress without being offensive to those who hold to one or the other forms of belief in the creator is ridiculous. It would have been just as fair to have indulged in the same presumption about any one of the other bodies which applied for the use of the World's auxiliary facilities.

Churchly Purpose and Performance.

Sheriff Whitcomb, of Berrien Springs, Mich., has notified the butchers, the bakers and restaurants, candy and cigar stands, drug stores, and all the other business places that they must keep closed doors Sundays hereafter.

The London Star says that the good Christians of the Isle of Skye amuse themselves and serve the cause of God by throwing bricks at tourists who take views there on Sunday. Well, in Boston, United States of America, photographic galleries are closed on Sunday by the police in enforcement of law.

On August 26th the members of the Muncie, Ind., baseball team were again arrested for desecration of the Sabbath. The Sunday previous the team played a game with Alexandria. To evade the law no admission fee was charged, but those who went into the grand stand were charged twenty-five cents. By this assessment the Ministerial Association alleges that the law was violated.

The retail grocers of Kansas City have decided to close their places of business on Sunday, after October 1st. Says the Christian Statesman: "Those who open their stores on Sunday after that date will be prosecuted. This was decided by the retail Grocers' Association. The time was set five weeks in advance to give the members a chance to secure the cooperation of the butchers. Some of the grocers also conduct meat markets, and to protect them the grocers propose to close the meat markets also."

At the recent meeting of the New York Sabbath Association it was "Resolved, That we rejoice in and indorse the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, on Feb. 29, 1892, that 'this is a Christian nation.' Resolved, That we see in such contrary decisions as that of Judge Stein, of an inferior court, the necessity for putting the decision of the Supreme Court into our national Constitution that all our Christian institutions may have an undeniable legal basis in our fundamental law. Resolved, That we rejoice in the World's Fair Sabbath-closing law, and in the equally impressive failure of Sunday opening, and we urge that these great victories be vigorously followed up with state and local victories over Sunday papers, Sunday trains, and Sunday mails."

It Will Kindle the Light.

STITZER, WIS., Sept. 12, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please find $5 to pay for Samuel P. Putnam's "Four Hundred Years of Freethought." May it kindle the light of science and reason never more to be extinguished by Christian ignorance and superstition. I wish the Freethinkers' Congress a great success. My design is to be with you at the great Columbian Exhibition in Chicago.

Truly for the cause of light and reason,
WM. A. GRISWOLD.

Scatter The Freethought Seed.

CHAPIN HOME, N. Y., Sept. 16, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: A friend in Camden, N. J., writes me that THE TRUTH SEEKER I sent him has been distributed among friends in his vicinity, and has been read with a great deal of interest. I think you may soon expect some subscribers for the paper. They are outspoken about the truth your paper contains.

Let all Liberals scatter the seed by the wayside, and it will yield fruit an hundredfold. All it wants is the people to read without superstition or bigotry. Then they will discover a rich mine open to them, where they will find reason and common sense, when no Salvation Army, with all their toot-horns and cymbals combined, could ever make a convict of Freethought.

S. R. THORNE.

Pay the Dominies Off in Their Own Medicin.

NEW CAMBRIA, KAN., Sept. 10, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: It is well known that the dominies dictate the course of the secular press, especially the local press or county papers, at least to the extent of suppressing anything of a Liberal or Infidel character, and at the same time claim the right to denounce the above doctrine most vehemently through the same channel. Now, we do not believe in suppressing anybody, but in self-defense it is well enough sometimes to make these doctors take their own medicine, and the way to proceed is to go to the weak-kneed editor as I have done and demand a hearing in self-defense; and if this is denied, then demand of the editor that he cease to give the dominie a hearing without he will consent to a reply, and that of course he will not do. He would rather remain silent than to do anything that would be the cause of setting the people to thinking; so to this extent we can suppress them and make one grand stride forward by compelling the secular press to at least remain neutral.

JOHN W. ABBOTT.

Battle Must be Fought Openly and Justly.

WARREN, O., Sept. 13, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Herewith I again send you a year's subscription. Am sorry that I could not send it sooner, but these are hard times to raise money, you know. At my age, when the snows of four score years are fast approaching, and these made none the less tolerable by a term of service in the tented field, I feel that this may possibly be my last remittance for the paper that has so valiantly fought the battles of progress.

Its old battle for secularization of the schools begins to have new adherents, but if our schools are to be saved from papal interference and perversion, the battle will have to be fought openly and justly, as has been contended for by the Secularists. Secret societies will only produce opposition in kind. What we need is to make the schools purely secular, and stand by them on that line, if it takes the last man and last dollar.

It would please me to do whatever I can to help along the cause of progress and humanity, and I wish success and prosperity to the good old TRUTH SEEKER, which has done so much and so well.

Very truly yours, THOS. DOUGLASS.

The Clergy Afraid of Ingersoll.

FORT PREBBLE, ME., Sept. 9, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: After a long time without the good cheer of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I inclose $4, for which send the paper to my address for six months, and the following books: "Force and Matter," "History of Religions," and "Men, Women, and Gods."

When I wrote to THE TRUTH SEEKER last I was in the priest-ridden city of Atlanta, Ga., at the time when the clergy of that city had their scare about Colonel Ingersoll coming to lecture. How the orthodox pigmies did howl when it was made public that the colonel was coming, and well for them they did howl, for if such men as Ingersoll, Remsburg, and Putnam would only go down there they would cripple their profession and make it necessary for them to gain a livelihood by some other means than dispensing fire and brimstone to the poor, unfortunate beings who come under their leprous voices. There are more than thirty-five churches (temples of superstition, I call them) in Atlanta, each one of them with a holy, pious sky-pilot quartered on its adherents, for no benefit to the people, but for revenue for themselves.

I do not know how this city stands in orthodoxy, as I only arrived at this station two days ago. Yours for Freethought, SAMUEL B. PRICE.

Official Taffy for Leo.

SHAWANO, WIS., Sept. 15, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I think it was during the election campaign of last year that I read an article or speech in THE TRUTH SEEKER, by Mr. McCabe, of Albany, N. Y., the drift of which was to favor the election of Mr. Cleveland on the ground that he would not toady to the Roman Catholic church as much as Harrison had done, and would do again if reelected. While it is a sad fact that Mr. Harrison was more or less guilty of bowing to Rome for promised or hoped-for political influence, and made several disgraceful important appointments upon the sole ground of the appointees being Romanists, and upon the demands of Bishops Ireland and Gibbons, it is also a well-known fact that he stood by General Morgan, commissioner of Indian affairs, in his correct policy not to allow the Catholic Bureau at Washington to exclusively run the Indian schools for the express and exclusive benefit of the Romish church, on public money, to the extent of half a million dollars each year. It is also well known that fidelity to General Morgan is what consolidated the Roman church vote against Harrison for Cleveland, and elected him. The acts of Cleveland since March last are almost positive proof that he was a party to a bargain to do as he has been doing, because, if the country has been watching the appointments, it is plainly evident that Rome has got far more than her share of the spoils—not perhaps in so conspicuous a way as Harrison's appointment of Egan and Ryan, and lots of others, but they have "got there" just the same all over the country in the desirable local snaps. And to cap the climax of Cleveland's shameful sycophancy, he insulted the American people by sending Pope Leo his taffy letter of congratulation upon the occasion of Leo's "jubilee," which took place a long time before Cleveland was president!

It is evident that Cleveland has entered into a secret understanding with the Roman octopus to become a candidate for president for a "third term," to break the record of Washington and all former presidents, and that the Catholic vote is pledged to him for that event. But what I started in to do was to remind Mr. McCabe that, while he might have had honest faith in his belief, it turns out that he was awfully mistaken, which should warn all patriots to look well after the candidates for office before election, by open and specific pledges of where they stand on the Romish question, and this will naturally lead to a wonderful growth of the American Protective Association, which the octopus hates and begins to fear. While office-hunters of all parties cater to the Romish vote and betray the people by obeying Rome after elected, there is no salvation for Americans but political action, at the ballot-box, after the manner of the American Protective Association.

W. S. Wood.

Settled Down to Take The Truth Seeker.

COCOANUT GROVE, FLA., Aug. 30, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: Please send me a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER for one year. I will inclose $3. It has often been my fortune to meet with copies of your paper. I saw a great many while Mr. Bennett was on his trip around the world, and often since, and my verdict every time was that it suited me the best of any paper I ever saw. But I was always pretty well loaded down with reading matter, having all that I could spare the money to pay for and the time to read. But I got one while at the World's Fair at Chicago, from which I have just returned after a little more than three months' stay at the breezy city. And let me say I almost fell in love with the place, the city as well as the Fair. As I was saying, I got one of your papers at the Fair, and it was so good that I decided I must try and make room for the paper one year at any rate.

I was particularly anxious to get a full account of the Freethinkers' Convention. How glad I would be if I could have stayed to see it.

I was particularly interested in the religious conventions assembling at Chicago. But I soon discerned they do not represent the best thoughts of the world untrammelled. They represent principally the clique or committee that selected the writers of essays. It was very apparent that in theological matters they were running in a very narrow groove, but the problem was solved when I learned from THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 24th that they would not permit an attack on any established religion. What a transparent sham, to call a congress of the world and decide before it meets to discuss methods and ways and means to promote the welfare of mankind, that it must not attack the greatest evil that ever cursed human beings, priestcraft.

Now, just a word with regard to my outing. After staying here in Dade county, Florida, nineteen years, less a month and a half, it was decided I was entitled to a vacation, and a very pleasant vacation it was, meeting and spending considerable time with a brother and his family and a sister and her family that I had not seen for twenty-eight years. In fact, I had never seen their families at all. I was glad to get back to beautiful, pleasant Biscayne Bay and away from the heat of Northern cities. It may surprise some Northern people to hear that it is cooler here in summer than in the North, but it is true, nevertheless.

In the nineteen years that I have been here I never saw the thermometer above ninety-three degrees in the shade, and very seldom up to ninety degrees.

Hoping a great many of our Northern Liberal friends may find the climate and the people here pleasant and congenial, I am, with best wishes,

Yours truly, SAMUEL RHODES.

The Clergy Oppose Every Good Thing.

ADRIAN, ILL., Sept. 6, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: The fact that the clergy are opposing the opening of the World's Fair so strenuously is not to be wondered at, because history demonstrates that the church has undertaken to dabble into everything since its organization. Starting with the advent of Christ, they began opposing him. Their opposition continued until they caused his crucifixion. Now, what spirit of religion could have possibly caused this?

Finally, after the sect known as Christians grew powerful and overcame the pagans in war, they made Constantine the Great emperor. A more inhuman wretch never existed. He murdered his near relatives, and committed crimes too numerous to mention. Was it religion that promoted such acts? I rather think not; more likely the devil, if there is such a thing.

Peter the Hermit went all over Europe, preaching the Crusades. Why? Did he do it because of any religious feeling? No. He did it simply to be revenged for imaginary insults to himself. What religious sentiment prompted him to do this? Only think of the many millions who perished in the Crusades. A horrible religion, a more horrible clergy.

When the Reformation began, John Huss was burnt at the stake, not because of any religious feeling for him, but to demonstrate to the world that it was unsafe to oppose the church. What is to be expected from such an element? If they would burn John Huss, would they not oppose the World's Fair?

Next followed the execution of the martyrs of Brussels at Brussels. There the preachers danced around those burning boys for a long time. Is it to be wondered at that the same element should oppose the World's Fair opening on Sunday?

At Metz, a short time after, the preachers executed La Cleric. They first sawed off his legs, they sawed off his arms, they cut out his tongue, cut off his nipples, dug out his eyes, and afterwards placed a red-hot iron around his head. They then threw him on a heap of burning fagots. What religion would tolerate such damnable deeds?

In Scotland the people became so thoroughly imbued with a religious sentiment that they gave all their lands and their chattels to the preachers during the eleventh century. As a consequence, the preachers became so arrogant, that the people were compelled to appeal to Rome. The pope replied that he was powerless to do anything for them. The result was that the people rebelled. If the preachers were successful in having the World's Fair closed on the Sabbath, they no doubt would want visitors to contribute something to the church before entering. There is no religion in that.

During the seventeenth century Jeffries made a trip down in West England. He caused to be hung over three thousand of England's most worthy citizens. Yet he claimed to be a good Christian. It is said to have been the most bloody act ever perpetrated by a person claiming to distribute justice. If there is such a place as hell, Jeffries is there. Yet it was done under the guise of religion; so is the opposition to the Sunday opening of the World's Fair.

It is stated upon good authority that Ex-Secretary Wanamaker wants the church to boycott the Fair if it opens on Sunday. I always thought Wanamaker was an old hog. Now I know it. He can afford it, but he has no feeling for the poor laboring men who cannot.

Wanamaker's object is to get the church trade by taking such a stand. He thinks other men too liberal-minded to resort to such methods.

If the church resorts to such methods, I say other people, who do not belong to the church, ought to take like measures.

M. J. RUSSELL.

Catholics Arming.

MILWAUKEE, WIS., Aug. 5, 1893.

MR. EDITOR: I think you ought to know what I am about to write, viz.: On August 1st I had business at Bay View, a suburb of this city, and the first man I spoke with there complained of the hard times, etc., and he told me that the Roman Catholic priests were holding secret meetings and drilling every day; that the Catholic churches were filled with arms and ammunition; that they had tried to keep their members from doing any trading at Protestant stores; that just before the last election they had a lot of tickets printed. On the Democratic ticket was Cleveland, pictured as an angel, in the act of going to heaven. On the Republican ticket was Harrison, pictured in the form of a devil. The priests forbade their members voting for him, but they must vote for the angel. Not long ago there were several boxes shipped here to the priests, and marked, "Old wine, from the old country." In taking them from the cars one was burst open, and it was filled with firearms. (Queer Bibles to be sent to the house of God.) They were moved to the church in the night, and they have plenty of arms and ammunition in the Catholic churches all over the country. Another young man told me he was going to get a gun and carry it for self-defense. From there I went to Cuddaby. A Protestant told me there that the Catholic church was filled with arms and ammunition, and the priests were holding secret meetings and drilling every day, and about the 15th of September intended to make the grand rush, and at the dead of night, when every innocent Protestant was asleep, burn and slaughter every one who opposed them.

How is that for Christians? No need of trying to get information from an alderman or mayor, for in the majority of cases they were put there by the Irish Catholic vote.

There are Catholics all around me, and I do not want my name published, as it would seal my fate; but I have given you facts, not fables. Things are getting serious.

On Saturday, August 5th, there was a funeral here at the Catholic cemetery. The young priest, on his way back to the church, met two young ladies, and induced them to go back to the church with him and he would give them some nice pictures for their books. They entered the church with him, when he locked the door and they were his prisoners; he commenced his advances toward them. When they knew what his object was, they wanted to be let out, and said they would tell their father if he did not let them go. But he would not until he made them promise not to tell their father. Then he unlocked the door, and they went right home and told their older sister, who told the father, who straightway got out a warrant and had him arrested. His trial came off the next Monday, and the justice let him go. He straightway packed his grip and left the country.

As near as can be learned, Uncle Samuel is feeding and clothing a traitor at the Soldiers' Home, near Milwaukee. The priest pays him, I understand, $15 per month for drilling a company of young Catholics in the manual of arms.

Now, Mr. Editor, if these facts are realized, if the true Americans don't clean them out root and branch from this continent, and then immediately enact such stringent laws that not one of the traitors will ever be allowed to set foot upon our free soil again, then they ought to suffer. History points to the truth of their great aim, and if a lesson cannot be learned from past events, what use is experience?

The people are also aroused on this subject at Lincoln, Neb., and have written the governor for a means of defense, but he only replied there is no danger. It is always so—no danger until the enemy is upon us. Then what can we do? Nothing but an unconditional surrender to a "Dago" pope. Arouse the people in time.

Hoping this time this may reach you safely, I remain truly yours,

AN OLD RESIDENT.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communication for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Aunt Avis.

Aunt Avis once was young and fair
With rosy cheeks and soft brown hair;
Her voice was tender, sweet, and low
As murmuring brooklet's gentle flow,
In time came suitors her to woo,
With words of hope and promise true;
From all she chose the soldier brave,
And unto him her whole heart gave.

In fondest trust they then were wed,
"For better," and not "worse," he said.
And then began her days of joy,
Brimful of love without alloy.

And Avis felt her bliss complete,
Of heaven sure a foretaste sweet,
When babies two came her to bless,
With wealth of precious happiness.

One morn the husband, smiling, said,
As to the door his horse he led,
"Dear wife, I go to mill to-day,
But not long shall I be away."

He kissed the babies, face and feet,
"Good-bye," he said, "my darlings three,
And keep the supper warm for me."

Aunt Avis watched him ride away.
Her fair young husband bright and gay,
Then, cheerily to her work she turned,
With spinning flax all day concerned.

At length 'twas time for him to come,
He who e'er made the light of home;
Aunt Avis laid her work away,
Wondering why he should so long stay.

She watched the shadows slanting west,
And rocked her babies to their rest.
No supper would she touch till he,
Her husband dear, with her should be.

But daylight into twilight crept,
Till night upon earth's bosom slept,
And still, she waited there alone,
Waiting the coming of her own.

Ten—eleven—twelve!—the midnight hour
Wrapped in its darkness leaf and flower;
Anxious she listened at the door,
For ne'er had he so staid before.

That night, and many nights the same,
She watched for one who never came;
Listening, waiting, night and day,
Till youth and beauty fled away.

O, what suspense, and doubt, and dread!
Was he alive, or was he dead?
For since that morn that dawned serene,
Horse, or rider, was never seen.

One babe soon vanished from the earth;
The other in young manhood's worth,
Passed suddenly to dreamless sleep,
And left her all alone to weep.

With her to labor was to pray;
With earnest work she wretched each day;
And every night through shadows dim,
She kept the supper warm for him.

She waited still with hopes and fears,
Through the mists of seventy years,
Till patience, industry, and thrift,
In gloomy cloud made shining rift.

"To sit and think," she said, would kill.
But work bids storms of grief be still.
And though her heart was sad and sore,
She toiled till wealth came to her door;

With it, she many comforts gave,
And some from sin her hands did save;
And good deeds, to young and old,
Returned in love a thousand fold.

Pure, and more pure grew her sweet face,
Saintly, in tender, holy grace
Until she entered into rest,
By ninety years crowned and caressed.

O woman's love and woman's trust!
Faithful, till dust doth enter dust!
If blessing wait beyond the pall,
Aunt Avis, thou deserv'st them all.

—From the Story Hour.

Feast the Eye.

The rainbow comes and goes,
And lovely is the rose.

—Wordsworth.

We all enjoy a feast of good things—to eat what tastes good to us; to please the palate and delight the appetite.

But almost as sweet is it to feast the eye—to see the beautiful things nature spreads around us. Each tiny blade of grass or green leaf has a thousand beauties if we study it carefully. The smallest flower that blooms is perfect in loveliness.

The fitting clouds, the rippling streams, the breezy hills, and cool, green meadows each and all have their charms and their sweetness.

"Seek and ye shall find." We usually find what we look for. If we start out determined to find the good, the true, and the beautiful, we shall discover it in abundance. But if we seek flaws, thorns, and imperfections, they will thrust themselves before us. I often think of the old lady who made it a point to find dust and dirt in the houses of her friends. She would drop the ball of yarn so as to turn up the edges of the carpet and see if there was not dust or dirt hidden there, and of course seldom failed of finding some.

But think you not she would have been far happier had she sought cleanliness, beauty, sweetness, and light?

We become what we most love and admire. We daily make ourselves through our thoughts, our words, and our deeds.

We "grow pure by being purely shone upon." Hence it is we should cultivate the taste, and feast the eye.

Science.

Our Kid Gloves.

The fact is we do not many of us own a pair of kid gloves, although we think we do, and we buy what we are told are really kid gloves. But there are very few real kid gloves in the market. How can there be, when in the whole known world there are such a small number of goats, comparatively speaking? Goats do not and cannot begin to supply the demand for gloves. What then? Well, the skins of young lambs must furnish a substitute, and your lovely kid gloves are, nine times out of ten, made from the skin of the little lamb. A lady said, "I always wear kid gloves." She probably never wore a genuine kid glove in her life.

The process of preparing a glove of lamb-skin which passes for kid is quite interesting. The skins are taken to the manufactory and immediately dumped into large tubs or tanks. These tanks are filled with the yolks of many eggs, and some other adhesive material added. In this mixture they are mixed and pounded softly with a padded stick. In some factories men tread them barefoot, instead of using the stick. This is called "nourishing." After nourishing a certain length of time, they are rinsed carefully in clean water. This leaves them soft and pliable, and in color a dullish white. They are then pressed out and stretched, rough side down, on a marble slab, till every wrinkle has disappeared. While thus stretched, they are dyed in various colors, the dye being applied with a brush. The utmost precaution is used so as not to get any of the dye on the inside of the skin, a stain being considered a great injury in the sale of a costly glove. The skins are then taken to the drying-room, where a high temperature soon leaves the skins dry, hard, and somewhat rough. But they must be soft and smooth before they can be worked. To get this result they are left for several days in moist sawdust, when they are stretched again to the greatest extent by a machine, which is worked gently by means of a screw. After this process the skins are ready to be made into gloves. Sometimes it falls out that there are cracks, or thin places in the material, and if these are made up they will be pretty sure to tear the first time worn. Many of these poor skins are made into gloves and sold at cheap rates. But it is never safe to buy cheap gloves—they are generally the dearest in the end.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Are there many real kid gloves in the market? Why are there not? What substitute is used? Explain the process of preparing lambskins for glove-making. Is it good policy to buy cheap gloves? Why?

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.

Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

APOLLONIUS OF TYANA IDENTIFIED AS THE CHRISTIAN JESUS.

An important and remarkable revelation concerning the life and times of Apollonius of Tyana, the great sage and philosopher of the first century. It is here claimed that his life and teachings were appropriated and utilized by the formulators of the Christian religion in the interest of so-called Christianity. The plagiarism is made plain in this brief history of Apollonius, especially in view of the historical references and comments thereon. It is quite evident that to conceal the plagiarism, the name of Apollonius was suppressed.

A NEW BOOK.—AND A MOST ORIGINAL ONE.

The Creation of God.

By DR. JACOB HARTMANN.

An explanation of the origin of the God Idea, and the mental processes that led to the formation of idols and the worship of them. From the time of Terah's apostasy, Abraham's reformation and his banishment for heresy and blasphemy against the Chaldean idols, to Christ's coming, the principal characters are analyzed and shown to be human, by thought and deed. It is made plain that the peculiar phraseology, cant sayings, subterfuges, miracles, wonder-workings, and supernatural padding are the proper offspring of the then existing barbarism, ignorance, and superstition, constituting the peculiar politics of the day.

A Liberal living in Michigan said once that he would give $25 a year to have the Crimes of Preachers recorded, as the frequent lapses of virtue of the ministers showed how little value Christianity possesses to make men moral.

We have just issued the Fourth Edition of the book doing this. The additions for this new edition of the

"Crimes of Preachers"

shows nearly 400 cases of ministerial conduct. While those in previous editions show that within a few years about

1300 MINISTERS HAVE BEEN GUILTY

of one kind or another of criminal conduct. Most of the crimes are against women, for the fair sex are at once the weakness and the strength of the church—"the church" meaning of course the clergy.

Notwithstanding the many additional pages, we have kept the price the same, 25 cents. Send for a copy, and confound the churchmen. Show them just what sort of scamps are the clergy who have closed the World's Fair on Sunday, because it is so holy a day that to look upon machinery or paintings in this period is "immoral."

BOOKS

SALADIN

(W. STEWART ROSS).

Editor of the

LONDON AGNOSTIC JOURNAL.

GOD AND HIS BOOK:

When he had read this book Colonel Ingersoll wrote to the author: "You have earned the thanks of all who really think." It is a work of vast research, of sound criticism, of caustic humor, of sledgehammer vehemence, of scathing satire, of pathos and eloquence. It is one of the heaviest iconoclastic broadsides ever fired at the Jewish God and the Bible.

Cloth, gold letters, $1.25.

WOMAN: HER GLORY, HER SHAME, AND HER GOD.

The Rev. Archdeacon Farrar said that "Christianity elevated the woman; it shrouded as with a halo of sacred innocence the tender years of the child." The object of Saladin's work is to show the archdeacon his error, and he has succeeded. An English writer said of it: "This certainly is one of the most marvelous books ever issued from the press. The authorities cited are unquestionable, and the result is convincing."

In two volumes, cloth, gilt lettered, $2.50.

JANET SMITH: A PROMISCUOUS ESSAY ON WOMAN.

This is one of the most delightful of Saladin's books, a dissection of woman, with incidental tearing apart of man—caustic, sarcastic, yet philosophical withal, and permeated with a tender reverence for woman and exalted opinion of what she is and should be. A merciless satire upon certain of the conventional foibles of the day, full of facts, faucies, truths, rare touches of genius, and bursts of eloquence. Most of the satirical shafts aimed at the woman go past her and stick in the man behind her, and it serves him about right.

Cloth, uncut edges, gilt top, $1.

CHRISTIANITY AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

A condensation of the known facts upon this subject, proving that Christianity did not abolish but aided this infamous traffic in human beings. To which are added such comments as only Saladin can make. In paper, 80 cents.

THE TRANSITION.

A consideration of the antagonism of the Bible and science, and of the question whether the veiled or allegorical portions of the Christian Bible can be interpreted by modern science. In paper, 20 cents.

ROSES AND RUE.

Being Random Notes and Sketches. Some of its subjects are: A Last Interview with a Man of Genius; An Essay on Stirpiculture; Asceticism and Superstition; Capital Punishment; Poverty; God in the Constitution; Bruno; Gods; Witchcraft, etc. This may be called Saladin's own book, for it is poetry in prose, and is one of the books that lovers of strong literature like to read again and again. In cloth, gold- and silver-lettered, $1.50.

LAYS OF ROMANCE.

This book reminds one of Sir Walter Scott, being romantic, historic verse, aglow in every page with the energy of a true and high poetic genius. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

ISAURE and OTHER POEMS.

The title poem is a story of intense passion, touchingly told. The other twenty poems are fresh, fragrant, thoughtful, and every verse reveals the thinker, observer, and reformer. Every page glows with passion and throbs with life. Cloth, gold-lettered, 75 cents.

A FEARFUL FLOGGING.

By one who endured it. Based upon a manuscript in the possession of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

THE AGONIES OF HANGING.

Studies in Psychology. By one who was cut down from the gallows. Printed from manuscript in the hands of Saladin. In paper, 10 cents.

WHIRLWIND SOWN and REAPED.

A short story of clerical crime and villainy founded on fact. Of this book the Open Court said: "This novel will command the same, or more, interest than Helen Gardener's story, 'Is This Your Son, My Lord?'" In paper, 25 cents.

THE CONFESSIONAL.

Being an exposure of that infamous religious rite. Contents: Li- tiousness of the Pre-Reformation Church; Lechery of the Confessional; The Priest in Abs- on; Confessions of the Escaped Nun; Extracts from Dens and Liguori; Examination of the Church's Claim to have Fostered Learning; Her Attitudes at Continency even more Ruinous than Her Self-Indulgence; The Relative Criminal Statistics of Catholicism and Protestantism. BLASPHEMY.

Argument by R. G. Ingersoll in the Trial of C. B. Reynolds, at Morristown, N. J. This is the greatest argument ever made in a case of this kind, and will be a model for the bar so long as the Christians use force to repress free speech. Its legal acumen is unsurpassed, its eloquence never equaled in a trial for blasphemy. Blaine for the Presidency; The Past Rises Before Me, or, Vision of War, an extract from a Speech made at the Soldiers' and Sailors' Reunion at Indianapolis, Ind., Sept. 21, 1876; A Tribute to Ebon C. Ingersoll; The Grant Banquet; Crimes Against Criminals; Tribute to the Rev. Alexander Clarke; Some Mistakes of Moses; What Must We Do to be Saved? Six Interviews with Robert G. Ingersoll on Six Sermons by the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D.; to which is added a Talmagian Catechism, and Four Prefaces, which contain some of Mr. Ingersoll's wittiest and brightest sayings. This volume has the greatest popularity, is beautifully bound in half calf or half morocco, mottled edges, 1,337 pages, good paper, large type, post 8vo. Price, postpaid, $5.

LIBERTY IN LITERATURE.

Testimonial to Walt Whitman. "Let us put wreaths on the brows of the living." An Address delivered in Philadelphia, Oct. 21, 1890, with portrait of Whitman. Containing also COLONEL INGERSOLL'S ADDRESS AT THE FUNERAL OF WALT WHITMAN, at Harleigh, Camden, N. J., March 30, 1892. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

PROSE-POEMS AND SELECTIONS.

Fifth edition, enlarged and revised. A handsome quarto, containing 333 pages. This is, beyond question, the cheapest and most elegant volume in Liberal literature. Its mechanical finish is worthy of its intrinsic excellence. No expense has been spared to make it the thing of beauty it is. The type is large and clear, the paper heavy, highly calendered, and richly tinted, the presswork faultless, and the binding as perfect as the best materials and skill can make it. As to the contents, it is enough to say that they include all of the choicest utterances of the greatest writer on the topics treated that has ever lived.

Those who have not the good fortune to own all of Mr. Ingersoll's published works, will have in this book of selections many bright samples of his lofty thought, his matchless eloquence, his wonderful imagery, and his epigrammatic and poetic power. The collection includes all of the "Tributes" that have become famous in literature—notably those to his brother E. C. Ingersoll, Lincoln, Grant, Beecher, Conkling, Courtlandt M. Palmer, Mary Fiske, Eliza Wright; his peerless monographs on "The Vision of War," Love, Liberty, Art and Morality, Science, Nature, The Imagination, Decoration Day Oration, What is Poetry, Music of Wagner, Origin and Destiny, "Leaves of Grass," and on the great heroes of intellectual Liberty. Besides these are innumerable gems taken here and there from the orations, speeches, arguments, toasts, lectures, letters, interviews, and day by day conversations of the author.

The book is designed for, and will be accepted by, admiring friends as a rare personal souvenir. To help it serve this purpose, a fine steel portrait, with autograph fac-simile, has been prepared especially for it. In the more elegant styles of binding it is eminently suited for presentation purposes, for any season or occasion.

PRICES.—In cloth, beveled boards, gilt edges, $2.50; in half morocco, gilt edges, $5; in half calf, mottled edges, library style, $4.50; in full Turkey morocco, gilt, exquisitely fine, $7.50; in full tree calf, highest possible finish, $9.

Any of the above sent to any address, by express, prepaid, or mail, post free, on receipt of price. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER, 28 Lafayette Pl., New York.

Gems of Thought.

We should avoid whatever may display bad feeling, and attend with civility to what may be addressed to us; all hearts are conciliated by politeness and affability. —Socrates.

We should speak only on those occasions when we are well acquainted with our subject, or when silence would be improper. —Ibid.

CONSCIOUSNESS, like thought, is a performance or action or phenomenal activity of certain parts or tissues of the brain, and in that capacity it is subject to all the changes which take place in the condition, nutrition, and growth of the brain. But the question as to whether, as Meynert thinks, capacity for consciousness is latent in the essence of the atom itself, or whether it is to be regarded as the result of a certain mode of atomic union taking place under certain conditions and circumstances, may for the present remain unanswered. How and in what way the atoms, the nerve-cells, or, to speak generally, matter, began to produce and bring forth sensation and consciousness, is quite unimportant for the purpose of our investigation; it is sufficient to know that such is the case. —Büchner.

THAT the conceptions of God, or of gods, have no substantial reason for their existence, seems to be evinced by the fact that these ideals are always influenced by the character of the people that entertain them. The god of the Indians was a great hunter, and smoked a volcano for a pipe. The god of the Greeks and Romans was a great warrior, and took part in battles, while demigods presided over music and poetry. The god of the Hindoos, under the soft influences that the climate had upon the people, was very mild and gentle, and, in a climate where fruit best suited the people, was opposed to the killing of animals for food. The ancient Jews were intensely cruel, sordid, and money-loving, and they conceived of God as full of jealousy and vengeance, and as being pleased with the useless shedding of the blood of innocent animals. —Moore.

THERE is no recorded instance where the uplifted hand of murder has been paralyzed—no truthful account in all the literature of the world of the innocent child being shielded by God. Thousands of crimes are being committed every day—men are this moment lying in wait for their human prey—wives are whipped and crushed, driven to insanity and death—little children begging for mercy, lifting imploring, tear-filled eyes to the brutal faces of fathers and mothers—sweet girls are deceived, lured, and outraged, but God has no time to prevent these things—no time to defend the good and protect the pure. He is too busy numbering hairs and watching sparrows. He listens for blasphemy; looks for persons who laugh at priests; examines baptismal registers; watches professors in college who begin to doubt the geology of Moses and the astronomy of Joshua. He does not particularly object to stealing, if you won't swear. A great many persons have fallen dead in the act of taking God's name in vain, but millions of men, women, and children have been stolen from their homes and used as beasts of burden, but no one engaged in this infamy has ever been touched by the wrathful hand of God. —Ingersoll.

It is becoming less and less possible for the man who puts his faith in scientific methods of ascertaining truth, and is accustomed to have that faith justified by daily experience, to be consciously false to his principle in any matter. But the number of such men, driven into the use of scientific methods of inquiry and taught to trust them, by their education, their daily professional and business needs, is increasing and will continually increase. The phraseology of Supernaturalism may remain on men's lips, but in practice they are Naturalists. The magistrate who listens with devout attention to the precept "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live" on Sunday, on Monday dismisses, as intrinsically absurd, a charge of bewitching a cow brought against some old woman; the superintendent of a lunatic asylum who substituted exorcism for rational modes of treatment would have but a short tenure of office; even parish clerks doubt the utility of prayers for rain, so long as the wind is in the east; and an outbreak of pestilence sends men, not to the churches, but to the drains. In spite of prayers for the success of our arms and Te Deums for victory, our real faith is in big battalions and keeping our powder dry; in knowledge of the science of warfare; in energy, courage, and discipline. In these, as in all other practical affairs, we act on the aphorism "Laborare est orare," we admit that intelligent work is the only acceptable worship; and that, whether there is a Supernature or not, our business is with Nature. —Huxley.

THE BRAIN AND BIBLE;

OR THE CONFLICT BETWEEN MENTAL SCIENCE AND THEOLOGY.

By EDGAR C. BEALL, M.D., with a preface by

R. G. INGERSOLL.

This is the only work of its kind in the literature of Free Thought. Its arguments are based upon scientific phrenology, and appeal directly to the reader's sense of logic and love of justice. It is eloquent as well as convincing.

ernment Banks Established in the Interest of and Owned by the Whole People.

By HON. THOMAS E. HILL,

of "Hill's Manual of Social and Business Forms,"
"The Hill Banking System," and other works of great service to the world.

Professor Hill has given several years of careful study to the elaboration of a system of sound money, that may fit immediately into present methods of doing business and be easily introduced and universally adopted.

This book is "just in time," is an absolutely original book from the beginning to the end, is a good-sized volume in clear type, and is the clearest exposition of money, uses of money, causes of money panics and remedies for the same, ever published. Orders are rapidly coming in and we want yours. Send twenty-five cents for copy.

Hard Knocks at Christianity.

By R. WHEELER.

This book is just what its title implies—thumping whacks at superstition. It deals with the effect of Christianity on the world, showing what Christians have done to advance their religion and impede the progress of man. It shows that Jesus was a false prophet, that the gospels are not authentic, and that Christianity is a borrowed system of religion. That the Bible is not in accord with Science, that the atonement scheme is futile and foolish, and that religion is not a real benefit to man.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A Nineteenth Century Novel

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with a little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroine. The narrative is, in the main, a history of a working-girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business-men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypo-rists. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price, 25 cents. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A most extraordinary publication. We venture the assertion that nothing like it has ever before appeared in this country, and it is very doubtful if another one like it will ever again be published. We must give the Truth Seeker Company the credit of putting the book in the reach of all. At twice the price it would have been a cheap book. Artist Heston as a portrait-painter and designer is a wonderful success, and we judge from our own feelings that nearly every Liberal in America will desire a copy of this most wonderful volume.—[Freethinkers' Magazine.]

Mr. Heston deserves to be called the artist-hero of Liberalism. He has dedicated his genius to Freethought, and has done faithful and noble work for the cause of right and truth. But the pictures do not make up the whole of this volume. There are nearly two hundred pages of reading matter that serve first as explanations of the illustrations, and secondly as texts to prove the utter falsity of the church's professions and the hypocrisy of those who uphold them. Altogether the book is one of the best weapons against Christianity and the church that has ever been put in the hands of Freethinkers.—[Boston Investigator.]

SEVERAL cases of small-pox have been discovered in New York.

EMILE ZOLA is in London, lecturing before the Institute of Journalists on anonymity in journalism.

HEAVY and disastrous floods in Japan recently. Hundreds of people were drowned and thirty thousand are receiving relief.

THE gunboat Alexander Petion of the Haytian navy foundered on September 6th near Cape Tiburon and all but one of her crew of ninety were lost.

CIVIL war is raging in Brazil. Most of the war fleet is in rebellion and for several days Admiral Mello bombarded Rio Janiero. Panic reigns in the city.

THE treasury of President Hippolyte of Hayti is empty and resident merchants refuse to lend him money. Besides a financial crisis, revolution is imminent.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND has appointed William B. Hornblower, of New York, to be associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, vice Samuel Blatchford, deceased.

PRESIDENT ASA B. POTTER, of the Maverick Bank, Boston, was acquitted in his second trial. He was charged with misappropriation of funds and falsification of the bank's accounts.

PRINCE MAX of Saxony, nephew of King Albert, has entered the cloister of Eisenach as a monk. Although he is but twenty-three the pope has appointed him apostolic vicar of Saxony.

CHOLERA is hourly spreading in Russia and other parts of Europe. Hamburg, which was so terribly stricken last year, is threatened with a recurrence of the epidemic, several cases having appeared in the suburbs.

THE remains of James K. Polk, tenth president of the United States, were, with those of his wife, Sarah Childers Polk, removed on September 19th from the tomb at Polk place and reinterred in the Tennessee state capital grounds at Nashville.

THE orthodox Jews and the Atheistic Jews are fiercely at outs in New York. The latter, mostly Russian Anarchists, complain that the Sons of Israel congregation persecutes them because of their unbelief and that the police afford them no protection.

A REVOLT against Austrian rule seems imminent in Bohemia. The suspension of the liberty of the press, and the right of trial by jury for political offenses, as well as of public meeting, in Prague and its vicinity, is bringing to a crisis the Czech agitation for home rule.

THERE is a revolt in the province of Buenos Ayres, Argentina. The national government ordered the provinces to disarm; Buenos Ayres treated this decree with contempt; then the people, under Radical leaders, took up arms to compel the provincial government to comply with the decree of the nation.

CHINA is becoming better prepared for war than she has been. She has obtained from German and British ship-yards many vessels of war. She also builds such craft herself, and manufactures modern breech-loading rifles. Indignant at France's doings in Siam, she holds, it is said, her fleet of iron-clads ready to sail "at a moment's notice."

THE United States government and the Canadian transportation companies have entered into a new arrangement regarding immigration. The companies will not sell a ticket into the United States to an immigrant unless he has a passport from United States inspectors, who will be stationed at ports of entrance on the international line, and will pay a head tax of fifty cents to the United States government for each immigrant carried.

IN the exchange of menaces between the Triple Alliance of Germany, Austria, and Italy on the one hand, and the Dual Alliance of Russia and France on the other, little countries are being pushed forward to pose as allies and produce the effect of a universal cataclysm. French papers drop hints of splendid new Danish fortifications, and Germans counter this by remarks on Belgium's and Roumania's magnificent new lines of defense. The Dual compact announces that the Russian fleet is also to visit Spanish ports, where it will be received with excited, significant enthusiasm. The Triple Alliance answers with a succinct report of Sweden getting together a fleet to offset Russia in the Baltic.

Darwin and After Darwin.

An Exposition of the Darwinian Theory.

By GEORGE J. ROMANES.

A systematic Exposition of what may be termed the Darwinism of Darwin, and intended to be of service to the general reader rather than to professional naturalists.
Mr. Romanes is well known as one of the most interesting of English writers upon evolution, besides ranking with Professor Huxley in scientific knowledge and ability. And this is a part of his conclusion regarding the great subject of Design, to which the church so often refers: "Thus whether we look to the facts of adaptation or to those of beauty, everywhere throughout organic nature we meet with abundant evidence of natural causation, while nowhere do we meet with any independent evidence of supernatural design. . . . Adaptation and beauty are alike receiving their explanation at the hands of a purely mechanical philosophy. . . . All nature has thus been transformed before the view of the present generation in a manner and to an extent that has never before been possible; and inasmuch as the change which has taken place has taken place in the direction of naturalism, and this to the extent of rendering the mechanical interpretation of nature universal, it is no wonder if the religious mind has suddenly awakened to a new and a terrible force in the words of its traditional enemy—Where is now thy God?"

RELIGION A CURSE, RELIGION A DISEASE, RELIGION A LIE.

By Samuel P. Putnam.

Dedicated to the American Congress, of 1892, which for the sake of Religion, Stabbed Liberty to the Heart.

A work burning with indignation inspired by the Congressional act closing the World's Fair on Sunday—an act which practically put the government and the Christian church.

To which is added Mr. Putnam's address delivered before the Columbian Exposition Committee of the House of Representatives against Sunday closing.

Also the following Essays and Poems by Mr. Putnam, which have never before been put in book form: Orthodoxy; Freethought; Man, Not God (written for a Paine anniversary); The Statue of Liberty and Thomas Paine; a poem written for the opening exercises of the Silverton, Ore., Free-thought Hall; Death and Life; The Golden Age; Shut the Door (a poem on the closing of the Centennial Exposition in Philadelphia, in 1876).

The main essay in this work is one of the strongest arraignments ever made of the religion which cramps and fetters the minds of the people of this country. It should be distributed widely. It has been commended in the highest terms as it appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER and we hope every reader will buy a copy to lend his neighbor and arouse thought.

Rensburg's Book on Lincoln Now Ready.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN: WAS HE A CHRISTIAN?

By John E. Rensburg.

One of the most noted controversies of the century has been waged over the question of Abraham Lincoln's religious belief. Soon after the remains of America's most illustrious son were laid to rest at Springfield, one of his biographers, Dr. Holland, put forward the claim that he was a Christian. The claim was promptly denied by the dead statesman's friends, but only to be renewed again, and again denied. And thus for a quarter of a century the question of Lincoln's belief has been tossed like a battledore from side to side.

For fifteen years Mr. Rensburg has been collecting material for his work. He presents an array of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming, and which must put this question at rest forever. In addition to the testimony of twenty witnesses who claim that Lincoln was a Christian, and which is reviewed and refuted, he adduces the testimony of more than a hundred witnesses in proof of the claim that Lincoln was not a Christian. These witnesses include his wife and other relatives; his three law partners; his private secretaries; members of his cabinet; his principal biographers, and scores of his most intimate friends.

PEN PICTURES OF THE WORLD'S FAIR.

By SAMUEL P. PUTNAM.

A Full Description of the Fair, Invaluable as a Guide-Book and still more Invaluable to those who cannot attend. It tells WHAT TO SEE and WHERE TO SEE IT; gives rates of admission to the various attractions of the Fair and cost of living in Chicago, with other useful information to the visitor.

It is, besides being a complete Guide-Book, the best description of the Fair yet given—poetic, beautiful, accurate. It describes the inauguration ceremonies, gives the director-general's address, the efforts to close the Fair Sundays and the triumph of the Sunday-openers; describes the various buildings and what they contain, and is, all in all, the very best picture of the Fair that can be painted with a pen.

ILLUSTRATED.

A MAP OF JACKSON PARK, enabling the visitor to make his way around, and the stay-at-home to see where he went.

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF THE FAIR, enabling one to comprehend at a glance the magnitude of the Exposition, the greatest ever known to the present time.

The Chicago Times said of it and her: "But the last address, dealing with the most delicate of the problems of reform, clear, unhesitant, modest, but uncompromising, was listened to with breathless interest by the audience. It was 'Heredity in Its Relation to a Double Standard of Morals,' and it was delivered by the one woman of all others best qualified to speak upon that subject—Helen Gardener. Petite, graceful, eloquent with the burden of her thought, Miss Gardener enchaind every auditor, and when she had finished received a perfect ovation, which her courage and devotion had so worthily won. The evening session was highly interesting, but that of the morning will be set down on the tablet of the memory of those present as one of the distinctively great features of the week's congress."

EVERY Woman Ought to Read It. Every LIBERAL Woman
and Man Will Want It.

WOMAN, CHURCH, AND STATE.

By Matilda Joselyn Gage.

This is Mrs. Gage's latest and crowning work. It is THE book to show how the church has enslaved woman and kept and keeps her in an inferior position. A glance at its contents will show this:

The first chapter—the Matriarchate—shows that under the old civilizations woman had great freedom, but that the tendency of Christianity from the first was to restrict her liberty. In this chapter Mrs. Gage claims that to the Matriarchate—or Mother-rule—the world is indebted for its first conception of inherent rights.

Chapter II deals with the theological dogmas of original sin and celibacy. Woman, by the church, was not regarded as a human being; marriage was looked upon as vile; wives were sold as slaves; women driven to suicide; the influence of the church was unfavorable to virtue. The celibacy of the clergy produced degrading sensuality, and woman was the victim of these brutes.

Chapter III is on The Canon Law, showing how the church controlled woman by making the legitimacy of marriage depend upon its own control of the ceremony. Ancient civilization gave place to Christian barbarism, the clergy became a distinct body—at once a "holy" and an unholy caste. Learning was prohibited to women, husbands prohibited from leaving them more than one-third of their property; daughters could be disinherited, sons could not. The Reformation effected no change.

Chapter IV—Marquette—is on Feudalism and its degradation of women, the rights of "lords spiritual," the immorality of the heads of the church, baptism of nude women in the early Christian church. It also deals with some of the later-day abuses of females, like our Northwestern pineries, the English debaucheries, governmental crime-makers, etc.

Chapter V—Witchcraft. In the days of this phase of religious insanity Mrs. Gage shows how the possession of even a little learning was sufficient cause to suspect a woman of witchcraft, that to keep a pet was dangerous, so rabid were the clergy not to suffer a witch to live. This persecution for witchcraft was a continuance of the church's policy for obtaining universal dominion over mankind. Women physicians of the Middle Ages were persecuted, and the "Pilgrim Fathers" continued it in America. The first synod convened in America was to try a woman for heresy, and others were stripped and whipped for not agreeing with the clergy.

The chapter on "Wives" shows how the disruption of the Roman empire was unfavorable to the personal and proprietary rights of woman—that the sale of daughters was practiced in England seven hundred years after it was Christianized—that the practice of buying wives was regulated by law—that women were not permitted to read the Bible—that they were not admitted as witnesses—that civil marriage is opposed by the church.

In Chapter VII is shown how polygamy was sustained by the Christian church, that the first synod of the Reformation convened to sanction this institution, that Luther and the other "principal reformers" favored it, as well as the American Board of Foreign Missions. The Mormon theocracy is shown to be similar to that of other Christian sects.

In the last three chapters Mrs. Gage treats of the opposition of the church to the amelioration of woman's sufferings as interference with her "curse," of woman's degradation by the church to labor unfit for slaves, of woman's "inferiority," as taught by the church to-day, and of how little value Christianity has been and is to civilization.

The work is a burning protest against the tremendous wrong done woman by the church, which controlled the state. It is also extremely valuable as history. No woman, it seems to us, can read it and remain a supporter of the religious institution which has crushed her individuality, her mentality, and degraded her person. To the woman's cause it opens an Age of Reason. It ought to be widely read for the good it will do.

"An Agnostic Ministry."

On another page Rev. Mr. Chunn endeavors to demonstrate the essential bigotry of an attempt on the part of the Unitarian church to set up any "dogmatic qualifications" for its ministry which should exclude Agnostic ministers from Unitarian pulpits. To an outsider it would appear that whatever reception his own congregation might accord to the deliverances of an Agnostic preacher, the church at large could not accept him as its representative. Juggle with words as we may, the fact remains that Unitarianism is a form of Theistic Christianity, and the man who wears its name can not, in justice to the organization, repudiate Christianity and Theism. Mr. Chunn's congregations at Luverne and Rock Rapids may be wholly in accord with the views he enunciates in this sermon and their right to accord him a generous support, financially and otherwise, we have no wish to call in question, but in their case, as in his, "Unitarian" is simply—to slightly vary a sentence of Professor Clifford's—Agnostic and Infidel "writ respectable." In passing it may be said that there are a number of such societies and such ministers in the West, and the fact is far from reflecting credit on Americans, showing that American courage and American directness are at a very low ebb in some sections. Agnosticism and Atheism are hated and feared, for they are not "respectable," they do not give admission to "good society," but Agnosticism and Atheism covered with the veneer of the Unitarian or the Universalist or the Congregationalist name find ready acceptance and support, for, forsooth, are not these all "Christian" churches?

Returning to the point at which we digressed, it might be profitable to ask Mr. Chunn, who seems to be a very earnest young man, whether he believes there is any organization—religious, social, industrial, or political—which would not grow more or less restive should one of its recognized spokesmen give public and continued utterance to opinions diametrically at variance with those popularly supposed to represent its position, and who should persist in calling himself by its name and should proceed to brand its members as bigots because they objected to his performances? Suppose, for instance, that one of our Liberal lecturers should become convinced of the truth of Theism, and of some of the fundamental tenets of Christianity, and should go about the country lecturing as a Liberal, but advocating Theistic and Christian ideas while looking to Liberals for recognition and support, and denying the right of Liberals to "set up dogmatic qualifications" to the extent of repudiating him as the representative of Infidelity and Agnosticism. Would Mr. Chunn say that this man could in any proper sense be called a champion of Freethought? That he was justified in attempting to utilize the Freethought platform for his Christian propaganda and in demanding Freethought support in so doing? That he was fair and honest in denouncing Liberals as bigots because they objected to his actions, and that his rightful place was not in the Christian pulpit? Or, suppose a man calls himself a Republican, but denounces Republican doctrines, praises Democratic principles and votes the Democratic ticket, how long will his professions of Republicanism be accepted, and how long before he will be excluded from the primaries of that party? These illustrations, showing the utter untenableness of Mr. Chunn's position, might be multiplied indefinitely, but lack of space forbids further citation here.

But this is not the only aspect of Mr. Chunn's position which may be profitably viewed. So far we have been considering the rights of the organization whose doctrines Mr. Chunn abjures while claiming the right to bear its name, accepting for convenience his assumption that the quotation he makes from the Christian Register bears out his contention that that paper is trying to set up dogmatic qualifications for the Unitarian ministry. We will requote the paragraph in question: "No literary ambition, or interest in social problems, or desire to deliver lectures, or love of philosophy, will be sufficient to hold any man or woman long in the ministry, unless there be also a deep and a strong desire to impart comfort by exhibition of the divine goodness and the hope of immortality."

To us this does not bear the meaning that Mr. Chunn appears to have extracted from it. It simply says, in clear, direct language, that no purely humanitarian enthusiasm nor any love for philosophy, as philosophy, will suffice to long hold a man in the Christian ministry after he has lost all faith in the supernatural dogmas of Theism and Christianity. This would seem to be almost axiomatic. Why should an Agnostic wish to continue to pose as a representative of an organization whose fundamental doctrines he repudiates, holding them to be false or unproven in science and morally pernicious? What business, anyway, has an Agnostic in the Christian ministry? Why does he want to be there? How can he feel at home in a temple to whose gods he cannot sacrifice? Is he so weak that he cannot stand without the supporting arm of a priesthood in whose worship he cannot share, and whose cherished beliefs he holds to be idle speculations about the "unknowable"?

Mr. Chunn avers that "The Unitarianism that would set up dogmatic qualifications for the ministry lacks the inspired Bible of orthodoxy, but it also lacks the consistency of orthodoxy. It is the hybrid offspring of orthodoxy and Liberalism, and it ought not to receive recognition by either parent." As shown in preceding paragraphs, there is no valid reason why a body of men, although wholly destitute of sacred books and divine standards of authority, should be asked to permit to pass as their own opinions which they do not accept, merely because the person who gives voice to those opinions chooses to tag himself with their corporate name. They are fully within their right in individually and collectively disowning him and his doctrines. Signing another man's name to a note of hand is not the only kind of forgery there is.

The minister who tries to preach Agnosticism in a Christian pulpit should be neither surprised nor indignant if he finds himself regarded as "the hybrid offspring of orthodoxy and Liberalism," and so fails to "receive recognition by either parent."

It might be pertinent to inquire what Mr. Chunn means by the phrase "heaven-born jewel." Being an Agnostic in so far as belief in a place called "heaven" is concerned, it would seem that such a positive assertion that our moral natures are born in that unlocatable region is scarcely in keeping. The scientific theory is that our moral natures have developed as have our bodies by almost inconceivably slow processes here on this earth.

Again, Mr. Chunn declares: "I am willing to trust that power which preserved me through past eternity, and brought me into this world about thirty years ago, to take care of me through future eternity. Whatever the condition may be that awaits me beyond the grave, it is the best condition that could await me." If this be accepted, was not the condition of those maimed and killed by the Pomeroy tornado "the best condition that could await" them? Then why does Mr. Chunn sneer at Christians who manifest the same "trust" in their "personal God" that he does in his "power"? "Trust" implies personality in that which is trusted, and the faith that "nature doeth all things well" is as much superstition as is the faith that "God doeth all things well."

What is the Religious Character of the Nation?

In the World's Congress of Religions, Prof. Thomas O'Gorman, of the Catholic University, said:

"We may truly say that with us separation of church and state is not separation of the nation from religion. The American conception is that the religious character of the nation consists mainly in the religious belief of the individual citizen and the conformity of conduct to that belief."

What does Professor O'Gorman mean by "nation"? If by nation we are to understand is meant the political machine, then we must say that there can never be peace and security in the republic so long as there is the slightest bond of union between it and religion, and we can readily believe that with such religionists as Professor O'Gorman and his confrères separation of church and state does not mean separation of the nation and religion. The phrase, "separation of church and state," is only "gull's seed thrown to catch the unwary." Professor O'Gorman gives the impression, or wants to seem to give the impression, that by "nation" he means the individuals of the country, spoken of as a collectivity, and that separation of the political machine from the church machine is not separation of this collectivity from religion. But we use words very loosely and carelessly when we make them say that the religious character of the nation consists in the religious beliefs of the individual citizens. The nation has a political character because it stands for a particular form of government, but it has no religious character, for the good reason that it stands for—or should stand for—no particular form of religion.

"The American conception is that the religious character of the nation consists mainly in the religious belief of the individual citizen and the conformity of conduct to that belief." "Mainly"? The religious character of the nation is composed chiefly of the belief—belief, not beliefs, mind you—of the individual citizens. But what is the minor factor of this religious character of the nation? The use of the word "mainly" implies that, in the opinion of Professor O'Gorman, there exist some elements of the religious character of the American nation—or government—other than the religious belief of the individual citizen. What are these unnamed elements? What can voice the religious convictions of the people, taken collectively, but the belief and consequent conduct of the individuals who compose the collectivity? Why, law, statute law, to be sure. What laws would Professor O'Gorman, as a member of the majority, demand to complement the belief and conduct of the individual Christian citizen in order that the religious character of the nation might be wholly shown?

Preacher vs. Preacher.

An incident of the World's Parliament of Religions;

"The feature of the evening was a bitter attack on the religion of the Hindoos by Dr. George F. Pentecost, the famous evangelist of London. His paper was entitled 'The Present Outlook for Religion.' He held that the Christian religion was the only true religion. He said some of the Hindoos have been here and have dared to make an attack upon Christianity. They cite the slums of New York and Chicago, and ask us why we do not cure ourselves. They take what is outside the pale of Christianity and judge us by it. He then attacked the religious systems of India, charging that they were immoral.

"He added: 'There have been several Buddhist bubbles floating around Chicago for the last week that need pricking.'

Almost at the same moment, Rev. Dr. Charles H. Eaton, pastor of the Church of the Divine Paternity, New York, was praising to his congregation the Parliament. These sentences fit the case of Dr. Pentecost quite as well as though they had been uttered especially for his admonition:

"The World's Fair is a marvel by day and a dream by night, but if human hearts are worth more than blocks of stone, then the religious congress is of more importance than all the rest.

"The object of the Parliament was an interchange of statements of all phases of belief, a comparison of views in a brotherly spirit and to show that there is a bond of common brotherhood among all men. The results would be the teaching of the universal necessity of religion to mankind. A Turkish peasant once looked down a well and saw the moon shining on the quiet water. 'What a pity it has fallen,' said he. He straightway procured a rope and grappling-iron, and, lowering it, caught the moon on the hook. He gave a strong pull and fell backward. As his head touched the earth, he looked up and saw the moon shining in the heavens. 'Allah be praised,' said he, 'I have put the moon back in its place.' Many Christians who assert their beliefs to be the only true guide would do well to note this little story and by observation they would discover many of the highest qualities in the so-called pagan people."

By the way, what does Dr. Pentecost mean by his declaration that the slums of New York and Chicago are without the pale of Christianity? Certainly, a vast majority of the denizens of those slums are firm believers in the dogmas of the creed of which Pentecost is one of the loudest champions.

Let Us Learn Good from Everything.

The peoples of Europe and America are not better than the rest of the world in all things. It is generally allowed by thinkers—though this is disputed by some—that they are better on the whole, on the average. But there are a good many points in which other peoples are our superiors. By Christians nothing would ever be said about these. They wish to represent our peoples as preëminent at all points, and others as defective at all points, because ours have Christianity and the others have not. But we can learn of foreign peoples in many things.

The Japanese are a very happy and contented folk. Perhaps they are more happy than we. If this be so, then, as happiness is the end of life, they can be said to be a race superior to us. However, happiness is a thing difficult to measure. We will not attempt a comparison. We will say merely that the Japs enjoy life mightily well. Their happiness is attributed by some travelers to the politeness that characterizes all ranks of them. Rich and poor, these are alike courteous. It is impossible to distinguish employer from laborer, wealthy from beggar, by their behavior. All, says a writer in the Fort- nightly Review, are clean, all are easy, all guide themselves by propriety in behavior. This politeness must go far toward securing happiness. Where courtesy is not in form merely, where it springs from, and promotes the growth of, real kindness in the heart, it settles all questions and difficulties of the relations of men with one another. Observance of the maxim referred to in the phrase, "In honor preferring one another," would pretty nearly altogether soften the roughness and sweeten the bitterness that pervade intercourse in our rude Western race.

The kindness of the Japanese to animals is remarkable in contrast to that exercised here. A case of cruelty toward animals by children, such as the tormentings of cats and dogs that our boys are continually at, is about as rare in Japan as a homicide in this land.

Japan has no poverty problem. One reason is said to be found in the land system, which gives a holding to every worker and encourages him to labor and reap not a part but all the fruits thereof.

The equality and intermingling of classes is great. It is helpful in a number of ways. The governor lets his child go to the common school and sit next to the child of the manual laborer, certain that his child will pick up no bad manners and get no contamination in thought or in person. This equality enables rich and poor to meet as friends, and gifts can pass without degradation. The rich nobles in the country are thus able to give to those whom they know to be in need, and friendship becomes the channel of charity.

Wants are limited in Japan. There is a curious absence of ostentatious luxury. The habits of living are in all classes much the same, and the rich do not outshine the poor by carriages, palaces, and jewelry. The rich spend their money on curios, which, if costly, are limited, and the most popular agitation is that against the big European houses which ministers build for themselves. Wealth is thus not absorbed, and is more ready for investment in remunerative labor.

We should admire and imitate good wherever we see it. It is only by so doing that we can maintain that slight advance over the rest of mankind which we now, perhaps, possess. But the priests and preachers would never urge upon us for adoption a trait or habit of any other people. They think that to admit that any other race has merits which we have not, would be to acknowledge the falseness of the clerical claim that Christianity confers all goods.

And the essential Christian spirit is not in harmony with any recognition of the excellence of others. That spirit is the quintessence of selfishness and self-conceit. The truly Christian impulse is, to think our world looked after by a god because we are on it, our human species of a different origin from other animals because we belong to it, our sect going to heaven and our neighbor's to hell because we belong to the former and he does not, and our nation better in every way than others because we are a member of it. The Christian spirit is the acme of selfishness and arrogance. When it prevails wholly it arrests all progress. The race can advance only by means of the policy of the Liberal—an impartial search for truth, and a free recognition of truth and merit wherever found, and adoption of them.

Agents Wanted.

We believe that not only can good be done but money made by any Liberal who will canvass for our book "Old Testament Stories Comically Illustrated." In fact we know one man who worked at it but a few hours weekly and sold nearly fifty copies in a month. The price is low; everybody knows the Old Testament stories, and nearly everybody would like a book applying nineteenth-century wit and knowledge to them. People like to laugh. Reverence for the Old Testament tales has largely disappeared and jokes at the expense of Jonah and Joseph and Esau and Samson and David, and the other worthies of unsavory reputation, are keenly appreciated. It seems to us that the book will sell at sight. It does here in the store.

Liberals out of employment will find this a good way to make an honest dollar.

Terms to agents sent upon application.

The New York Herald, in an editorial criticism of Zola's arguments against anonymity in journalism, says: "All the great movements in public opinion are anonymous. The belief in God is the result of the unanimous belief of the nameless crowd." This is true, and it is also true that the Southern lynchings and torturings are the results of the "unanimous belief of the nameless crowds." Peculiar coincidence isn't it, gentlemen of the Herald?

The eminent Dr. Brinton contradicts those who hold that diseases of the nervous system have increased with the increase of civilization. He says that "civilization, so far from increasing this class of maladies, is one of the most efficient agents in reducing them in number and severity, especially when free from religious excitement and competitive anxieties." For our part, we should conclude from the pages of history that at no period can nervous diseases have prevailed more than in the old times of religious panics and crazes, with the epidemics of convulsions, dancing manias, and the like.

A maze to the pride of intellect, the Bible is simple and sweet and blessed to faith. To the ritualistic Jews a stumbling block, to the rationalistic Greeks foolishness, to the faithful and lowly it is nothing short of the power of God. It comes to such as the sun rises out of the horizon upon him that watches for it, and shines upon him in all its sublimity.—New York Observer.

Eliminate intelligence, and to the "faithful and lowly" Mother Goose's Melodies or the Arabian Nights would be "nothing short of the power of God," if such a view of either were sedulously inculcated generation after generation, under penalty of hell on earth and beyond for non-belief.

In answering the question, "Does a man who is prosperous and rich in the world's goods owe a duty to his neighbor, who is less fortunate?" John Swinton says, in the Independent: "I know persons, who, repudiating all religious dogmas, act on this law. I know men who are really Infidels, blasphemers, repulsive persons, who act on this law with promptitude, precision, and inevitably." Indeed! And are these benevolent persons repulsive inherently, regardless of their infidelity, or are they simply repulsive to you, because they are Infidels?

"LONG BRANCH, N. J., Sept. 28, 1893.—Five hundred delegates were present to-day at the thirty-fourth annual convention of the State Sunday-school Association, and the Rev. Mr. Provost in his address startled them. 'Many of the Sunday-school teachers,' said he, 'are users of rum daily, go to races, gamble, play cards, and use profane language. I know many and can name them in this building, but do not feel like it just now.'

When you make church-membership and activity in religious work the conditions of social respectability you inevitably breed hypocrites. History bears sad but eloquent witness to this. When the National Reformers have won and the nation is "Christian" in law and name the hypocrites will be multiplied a million-fold.

As one of the fruits of the World's Congress of Religions we have the "Brotherhood of Christian Unity," an organization having for its object "The glory of the Creator and the relief of man's state." The New York Times indulges the presumption that "There are doubtless many professed Agnostics, and even avowed unbelievers, who will be prepared to subscribe to what is in no sense a confession of faith." Why unbelievers should profess to "desire to serve God" in order to work for humanity when they can labor in humanity's behalf without stultifying themselves by any such acceptance of Theism, the Times does not condescend to state.

"Joseph Garrison, a well-to-do farmer, who lives near the line between North and South Carolina, was one of the unfortunate farmers in this section whose crop was badly damaged by the great storm. Garrison went out in one of his fields of corn a day or so ago, and, seeing that it was almost totally ruined, he blasphemed terribly.

He returned to his house and has been in a delirious condition since. In his wakeful moments he repeats the epithets. The case attracted a great deal of attention."

The dailies head this—"Cursed God and Was Stricken." That this man's delirium was caused, as was his "blasphemy", by the loss of his crop, does not seem to have occurred to the reflectors of what the New York Herald calls the "unanimous belief" of the masses, so they jump to the irrelevant and irrational conclusion that some god hit him on the head and upset his reason because he had blasphemed his majesty.

It is significant that the victories of Freethought are in the fields of literature and science. In the domain of politics the church militant is still the church triumphant, in most cases. In the magazines and reviews we can feel the pulse-beats of a nobler and deeper thought, but the newspapers and religious journals chronicle an almost unbroken series of defeats for freedom of thought on every political rampart where the church enters the fight in earnest against the secular theory of government, against the cherished principles of the fathers of the republic, against the idea and fact of equal opportunities for citizens of all shades of belief, non-belief, and unbelief. We can study nature and we can dream of a better era, but we cannot, it would seem, hold our own in the face of a united church, of an invasive and aggressive hierarchy.

This country now possesses what is termed an American pope. This is Monsignor Satolli, who has been sent here to occupy a permanent position as chief arbiter and director of the concerns of the papacy in this country. His power is superior even to that of our archbishops. The Catholics are divided as to the desirableness of his office. Some of the clergy favor, and some seem inclined to resist, this prelate. One secular journal, the New York Herald, gives a surmise as to the pope's motive in establishing the office, which conjecture we think may not be far wrong, and which we will therefore print here, as follows: "When Mgr. Satolli said at the Catholic Congress in Chicago that 'America is the key of the future,' he indicated the motive of the pope in sending him here clothed with extraordinary power. The opinion is a perfectly sound one, and is ratified by the judgment of every student of history. Both politically and spiritually the republic is the hope of the world. It is no boast to say that we represent on the one hand the largest freedom of worship and on the other the most advanced ideas of government. Since, therefore, we have a domain which is practically without limit, and a population unaffected by religious traditions, we present to the missionary an ample and remunerative field for the exercise of his energy."

"The Congress may not be the occasion of giving a new composite religion to the world, but it will certainly have a tendency to create the impression that one religion is about as good as another, after all; indeed it has done something in this direction already. And as merely moral systems the difference may not be so very great; but while other religions have no power in them or back of them but the power of the human will, there is in Christianity the power of God to transform the soul. This fact has, however, been very largely lost sight of by the promoters of the Congress of Religions. They propose to make an exhibit of Christianity, but they can not thus exhibit its hidden power, without which it is not Christianity. The Congress of Religions is simply an exhibition of human vanity."—American Sentinel.

As the Sentinel seems disposed to admit that as "merely moral systems" there may be no great difference between the world religions, we are at a loss to see the need of the alleged transforming power of God in Christianity. Does the Sentinel mean to say that, no matter how good a life a man may have led, there can be no resurrection for him unless his soul has been transformed by the power of God through Christianity? The American Sentinel is making a brave and able fight against the God-in-the-Constitution fanatics, who are striving to make church and state one, and whose efforts, if successful, would result in the utter subversion of the liberties of the American people. Its enemies in this struggle are its fellow-Christians; its allies are the Freethinkers. Which—the hierarchical Christians or the Freethinkers—have felt the "power of God to transform the soul"? "By their fruits ye shall know them."

We desire to call the attention of readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to the benefits of subscribing to the Truth Seeker Monthly Library. The yearly subscription is only $3, and subscribers to the Library receive a paper-bound copy of each book issued in it; or, if they desire the books in cloth binding, subscribers can remit the difference in price between paper and cloth binding, and get the books in the latter shape. So far this year subscribers to the Library have received "Paine Vindicated," by Colonel Ingersoll, price 15 cents; the "Creation of God," by Dr. Hartmann, price 50 cents; the "Resurrection of Jesus," by Don Allen, price 40 cents; "Crimes of Preachers," price 25 cents; the "Handbook of Freethought," by W. S. Bell, price 50 cents; "Religion a Curse," by S. P. Putnam, price 25 cents; "Design Argument Fallacies," price 15 cents; "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair," price 25 cents, and "Abraham Lincoln: Was He a Christian?" price 50 cents. Other books besides are in preparation. One of these, we may mention, is "Pleasure and Progress," by A. M. Lorentz, LL.B., of which further notice will shortly be made. Send $3 and receive at once the books already published, and, as they appear, those which will be published between now and January, '94.

Freethought Progress.

The secretary of the Freethought Federation reports that the Congressman from a certain district is a Freethinker. Don't mention it; he voted for the Sunday closing of the World's Fair.

The Sunday omnibus business in Toronto is increasing; a second line being started on Sunday last, thus covering the city front for about six miles. No fares are charged, but a box is left on the seat, into which passengers drop what sums they choose to pay. Both lines appear to do well financially.

It is no indication of "progress" that the London National Reformer, the journal founded and for thirty years edited by Charles Bradlaugh, will soon cease publication, but it is some relief to know that its present editor, John M. Robertson, is to start a new monthly, to be called the Free Review. It will cost one shilling (25 cents) per number, fifteen shillings per year. The corps of contributors announced is the best possible guarantee of the quality of the publication.

Mr. G. W. Foote, editor of the London Freethinker, lectured early in September at Douglas Head, Isle of Man. It was a decided innovation, and he accomplished his purpose in plain defiance of the town commissioners, who arbitrarily ruled that only the clergy could occupy the common ground of Douglas Head. Mr. Foote was ably supported by Mr. Robert Forder and other fearless Freethinkers from various parts of England, and the Liverpool roughs of the Christian Evidence Society were nicely foiled in their attempt to create a mob and drive the Infidels from the Head.

"Kissing the book" is likely before long to become one of the lost arts. Another objector to the practice has turned up in the West London police court in the person of Dr. Morris Wallace, called to give evidence in a case where one woman was charged with stabbing another in the eye with a fork. The doctor said he had no religious scruples, but he considered that there was a risk to health involved in putting to his lips a book which has already been kissed by other people. The magistrate suggested as a compromise kissing the inside of the volume. But here, too, the doctor objected "on sanitary grounds," and he was finally sworn by holding up the right hand.—New York Herald.

Churchly Purpose and Performance.

Is religion no longer dangerous? The London Freethinker shows that the present pope has created "one new patriarchate, twenty-seven new archbishoprics, and seventy-seven new bishoprics."

The Sabbatarians of Yarmouth have incited the police to prosecute Sunday oyster-sellers, tobacconists, and fruiters, for following their own calling on the Lord's day, under the old act of Charles II.—London Freethinker.

The Consolidated Street Railway Company of Worcester, Mass., recently did some Sunday work on their tracks, upon which an indignation meeting was called by the ministers of that city to protest against a recurrence of the "desecration."—American Sentinel.

The Catholic Review, referring to Protestant missionaries, says that "in India, China, and other parts of Asia, in central Africa, with the help of British officers, they are exterminating the native Catholics and banishing priests and native rulers."

The grand jury of Tarrant county, Tex., hands this report to the presiding judge:

To HON. S. P. GREEN, judge of the forty-eighth district of Tarrant Co., Tex., Dear Sir: We, the undersigned grand jury, would respectfully report that we have made diligent inquiry into all crimes and misdemeanors that have come to our knowledge; that we have found three hundred and thirty-three bills of indictment, a large portion of them being for violations of the Sabbath law. The disposition of a great many business men to disregard the Sabbath seems to be growing to an alarming extent. While this does not apply to all lines of business, yet it does exist, and unless there is a united effort on the part of all law-abiding citizens to enforce the law, no one can foretell the result, as all the larger crimes are a result of disregard for law in minor offenses.

The woes of sinners in hell will not be a cause of grief to the saints in heaven, but of rejoicing; will be the fruit of an amiable disposition, and a perfect holiness, and conformity to Christ. At the judgment you may be ready to fly to some godly friend; but you will see them, unconcerned for you, with joy ascending to meet the Lord, and not less joyful for the horror in which they see you. When they hear you groan and sigh and gnash your teeth, these things will not move them at all to pity you. After your godly parents shall have seen you lie in hell millions of years, or ages, in torment day and night, they will not begin to pity you then. They will praise God that his justice appears in the eternity of your misery. The torments in hell will be immeasurably greater than being in a glowing oven, a brick kiln, or fiery furnace.—President Edwards.

"I notice in your paper a reference to the cost of converting Jews. It reminds me of the cost of converting the heathen in these parts. The missionaries of Kangra have been at work since 1846, and have converted in that time one adult. The Moravian missionaries at Lahoul have been at work about the same time, and have converted one Lahouli and one Ladaki (adults). Of course they do better business with infants, some of whom are voluntarily brought to the mission by their parents, while others are sold in times of scarcity. You will be interested to know what becomes of them. The children are brought up, of course, in the tenets of Christianity. When they arrive at marriageable age, a board forthwith assembles and decides which maiden shall be given to which youth. The marriage is then consummated. Thus more little Christians are bred, just as you would foxhounds and horses, and so the church of God increases." This is an entirely new view of the propagation of the gospel in foreign parts. But why, I would ask, can not this method of multiplying the saints be practised as well at home as in partibus infidelium?—Punjab, India, letter in London Truth.

Everyone going to Chicago this fall should have a copy of S. P. Putnam's "Pen Pictures of the World's Fair" in his pocket. He will find it a great aid to intelligent sight-seeing. Price, 25 cents; 5 copies for $1.

Lectures and Meetings.

COLONEL INGERSOLL'S LECTURE DATES.

The people along the line of the following towns will, during October, be made happy by a visit by Colonel Ingersoll, who will speak on the following dates:

Oct. 8 Louisville, Ky.	Oct. 19 Omaha, Neb.
" 9 Lexington, "	" 20 Council Bluffs, Ia.
" 10 Paris, "	" 21 Atchison, Kan.

An Agnostic Ministry.

The Christian Register, a Unitarian newspaper published in Boston, in its issue of August 24th answers the question, "What encouragement should be given to Agnostics to enter the ministry?" The gist of the Christian Register's answer to the question propounded is that an Agnostic, one who does not accept the belief in a personal God, and in the conscious existence of mankind beyond the grave, ought not to be encouraged to enter the ministry. This passage may be regarded as the keynote in the editorial article referred to: "No literary ambition, or interest in social problems, or desire to deliver lectures, or love of philosophy will be sufficient to hold any man or woman long in the ministry unless there be also a deep and strong desire to impart comfort by exhibition of the divine goodness and the hope of immortality." This position taken by the Christian Register on the subject of "An Agnostic Ministry" cannot be construed in any other sense than as an attempt to set up a dogmatic qualification for the ministry. That which distinguishes our Liberal faith from all other faiths in Christendom is the absence of any dogmatic test whatever for those who sit in the pews, and for those who speak from the pulpit. The door that leads to our pulpits, as well as the door that leads to our pews, is supposed to be wide and high enough to allow every man to enter freely, from the man who accepts the Nicene creed, which honors Christ and the holy spirit as worthy of worship along with God the father, to the man who turns away from the worship of both Trinitarian and Unitarian gods to bow reverently at the shrine of the "unknown and unknowable god." The Christian Register would not prefer charges of heresy against an Agnostic pastor, but it gives us to understand in the most unmistakable language that an Agnostic would be better off out of the ministerial profession than in that profession. Happily, the day has gone by when a Unitarian pastor can be tried for heresy, but unhappily the day has not gone by when, if he is an Agnostic, he may receive a hint that he could employ his time and talents to better advantage in some other profession than that of the ministry of religion.

The attempt to set up dogmatic qualifications for the ministry is always fraught with danger. The setting up of dogmatic qualifications for the ministry has been one of the greatest curses of orthodox religion, and has been the means of driving thousands of the brightest intellects from the orthodox faith. If Unitarianism is to bind its ministers to a certain creed, what more is Unitarianism than orthodoxy broadened out a little? If it is logical to encourage only those persons who accept the belief in the personality of God and in the immortality of the soul to enter the ministry, why is it not logical to encourage only those persons who accept the belief in the inspiration of the Bible and in the divinity of Christ to enter the ministry? Who has the right to determine what shall be or what shall not be a doctrinal qualification for a candidate for the Unitarian ministry? If you would add to the dogmatic qualifications that the Christian Register would demand of a candidate for the ministry the belief in a supernatural Christ, you would meet the requirements of the liberal Congregational churches. If you would add to the dogmatic qualifications that the Christian Register would demand of a candidate for the ministry a few more dogmas, such as the inspiration of the scriptures, the atonement, everlasting punishment, you would meet the requirements of the most orthodox church in Christendom. When we once begin to set up dogmatic qualifications for the ministry, where shall we stop? In our zeal to protect the churches from "unsound teachers," we may find ourselves vying with the most rigid orthodoxy in hedging in our pulpits. Orthodoxy, when setting up dogmatic tests for the ministry, can make a show of consistency, for it professes to find in its inspired Bible authority for setting up these tests. Unitarianism has no inspired Bible that it professes to accept as authority, and, therefore, unlike orthodoxy, it has no criterion to guide it when making dogmatic qualifications for the ministry. The Unitarianism that would set up dogmatic qualifications for the ministry lacks the inspired Bible of orthodoxy, but it also lacks the consistency of orthodoxy. It is the hybrid offspring of orthodoxy and Liberalism, and it ought not to receive recognition by either parent.

Orthodoxy we know, and Liberalism we know, but what is this mongrel faith that the Christian Register would invoke us to reverence?

It is not the particular object of this sermon to attempt to show the tenableness of the Agnostic position. But I wish to remark that the Agnostic can be driven from his position only by bringing against him an array of stubborn facts. He cares not for beautiful sentiments that are not based on stubborn facts. You may deliver to him a panegyric on the "Divine Goodness," but such a disaster as the late Pomeroy tornado proclaims in more convincing tones that God is Law than the most eloquent human tongue can proclaim that God is Love. The man who can stand amid the wreck of that Pomeroy tornado—the wreck of property, the wreck of life, and the still more awful wreck of mind caused by that never-to-be-forgotten event—and then worship a personal God of infinite power and goodness, would experience no difficulty in paying homage to the Jehovah of the Old Testament. In 1 Sam. xv, we are told that Jehovah commanded Saul to smite Amalek and spare not, but slay both man and woman, infant and suckling, ox and sheep, camel and ass. Orthodox scholars have attempted again and again to save the moral character of Jehovah in the face of this bloodthirsty command that he gives to Saul. I take up an orthodox commentary on 1 Sam., and I read on this passage: "The national interest required, and God, as king of Israel, decreed, that this public enemy should be removed." It fills one's soul with contempt to read the vain efforts made by orthodox scholars to preserve the moral character of the Old Testament God in the face of the long list of terrible crimes of which he stands condemned. But a personal God, who causes or permits such a disaster as the Pomeroy tornado is as guilty of just as heinous a crime as was Jehovah of the Old Testament when he commanded Saul to exterminate the Amalekites root and branch. We do just as great a wrong to our moral nature when we attempt to vindicate the justice of a personal God in causing or permitting the Pomeroy tornado, as we should do should we attempt to vindicate the justice of Jehovah in commanding Saul to exterminate the Amalekites. The time has come for theologians to cease making gods that men and women can worship only at the expense of crucifying their moral nature. One man can look always on the bright side of the picture of life, and sing the "Divine Goodness." Another man can fix his eyes on the dark side of the picture of life, and with just as much reason bewail the "Divine Badness." Some advocates of the Liberal faith can hold fast to their belief in a God, infinite in power, goodness, and knowledge in spite of the moral and physical evil with which the world is smitten. But other advocates of the Liberal faith who are just as reverent, just as conscientious, just as earnest in their efforts to work for the good of mankind, cannot cherish such a belief of God. The men and women who belong to this latter class can commend no characteristic in a God that they would denounce in a fellow-mortal. Their moral nature is their one priceless jewel which they will preserve intact. Nothing will ever induce them to worship at the altar of any God where they cannot worship without dimming the luster of that heaven-born jewel, their moral nature. These men and women have not renounced their belief in "God;" they have simply renounced their belief in the hosts of man-made gods—gods of thoughts as well as gods of stone—that have been set up as objects of worship.

Then, too, as regards the question of personal immortality, the Agnostic is not willing to accept sentiment as the equivalent of facts. If the Christian Register has any facts to give that man continues to live after the death of his body, we should be glad to take them at their full value. We should be glad to listen respectfully to all valid arguments that can be advanced in support of the belief that man is possessed of an immortal soul which survives the wreck of his mortal body. But no desire to follow the rules of religious etiquette, or to bestow comfort upon the sorrowful, ought to lead a man to give his assent to theories of the future condition of mankind that there are no scientific grounds for assenting to. Man, like all vertebrate animals, begins his existence in a simple cell. No eye can distinguish any difference between the simple cell that afterward becomes a man, and the simple cell that afterward becomes a dog. The individual life of man, like that of every other animal, begins with the act of fertilization. The individual life of man, as far as science can determine, ends with the death of the body. Science knows nothing of an immaterial soul that becomes a part of man at some period in his development. The difference between man and the dog is a difference of degree and not of kind. These facts, established by the investigations of modern scientists may not be pleasant facts to consider, but what good shall we accomplish if we close our eyes to the facts? The ostrich cannot escape from the hunters by hiding its head in the sand. We cannot escape the condition that awaits us beyond the grave by taking refuge behind pious sentiment. Every fair-minded person must look these facts squarely in the face. While the Agnostic sees no way to escape the conclusion arrived at by scientists regarding the future condition of mankind, he is not presumptuous enough to assert that science has solved the problem of personal immortality so that it can never be opened up again. Science may have failed to discover and to give due weight to all the factors that ought to enter into the solution of the problem of personal immortality. Science at this stage of its progress cannot be relied upon as an infallible guide to conduct us through the intricacies of the problem. The attitude that the Agnostic takes toward the question of personal immortality is not that of dogmatic denial or dogmatic affirmation; it is that of suspended judgment. When a man asks me if the planet Mars is inhabited, I answer: "I do not know; science has not yet in its possession sufficient data to determine whether or not the planet is inhabited." And, when a man asks me if the departed are enjoying conscious existence beyond the grave, I answer: "I do not know; science has not yet in its possession sufficient data to determine whether or not the departed are conscious in the shadow-land."

As far as the hope of personal immortality is concerned, the Agnostic has no quarrel with hope. But it is a war to the knife with dogma. Man in every age of the world has been making his god in his own image, and denouncing as an Atheist everyone who would not fall down and worship this god. And man in every age has been making his future world after the fashion of this present world, and denouncing as a Materialist everyone who would not believe in the existence of this future world. The time has come to call a halt on the manufacture of religious dogma. Men may well agree to differ in their opinion regarding a question on which so little light has been shed as that of the future condition of mankind. It is by no means a necessary conclusion that a continued conscious existence beyond the grave is the best possible condition that mankind could experience. I would not trust the best heaven-maker in the world to make a heaven for me in which I should be forced to spend future eternity. But I am willing to trust that power which preserved me through past eternity, and brought me into this world about thirty years ago, to take care of me through future eternity. Whatever the condition may be that awaits me beyond the grave, it is the best condition that could await me.

It seems to be difficult for the Christian Register to understand what motivates an Agnostic to enter the ministry. It is an historical fact that the man of the narrower creed has always found it difficult to understand what motivates the man of the broader creed could have to preach his message to the world. The man of narrow creed can discover lying beyond the bounds of his creed no truths that are worth preaching. A few years ago I heard an orthodox minister say that if he did not accept the doctrine of vicarious suffering in the strictest sense, that Christ shed his blood on Calvary to save mankind from the just wrath of God, he would have no motive to preach the gospel. The conservative wing of the Congregational denomination cannot appreciate the motive that prompts the more liberal members of that faith who believe in a "second probation" for the unfortunate heathen, to carry the gospel to heathen lands. The doctrine of a second probation "cuts the nerve of missions." The average orthodox believer cannot appreciate the motive that leads men and women to embrace the Unitarian faith. When you give up the inspired Bible and the supernatural Christ, you have given up all in religion that for the average orthodox believer has any value.

The truth is, that to broaden one's creed means to strengthen and not to weaken one's motive to preach. The Agnostic minister certainly has as strong and worthy motives as any man to preach his message to the world. The Agnostic minister has a just right to a share in these grand ethical truths which are the common property of all religions. These grand ethical truths, which are as old as the oldest of the world's historic religions, ought to constitute the staple of all preaching. There is no just reason for believing that either the orthodox ministry or the conservative Unitarian ministry has the monopoly of these ethical truths. Then the Agnostic's conception of God as eternal and unchangeable law is grander than the conception of God as personality. One of the greatest curses that has disfigured the Christian religion is the doctrine of the forgiveness of sins. Christianity has taught for centuries the pernicious doctrine that there is no sin under heaven, except the sin of honest doubt, that God will not gladly forgive. The Agnostic knows nothing of a God who can or who will forgive sins. Sin is a transgression of the law of righteousness. It is just as impossible for a man to transgress the moral law and escape punishment as it would be for him to put his hand into the fire and escape burning. It would require a volume to do justice to the evil results that have followed from the Christian doctrine of the forgiveness of sins. The Agnostic gospel of God as unchangeable law steers clear of the evil that the Christian gospel inculcates by its doctrine of God as unchangeable personality.

Another fault of which the Christian gospel stands condemned is that of teaching men and women to despise this world, and to fix their hopes on another world beyond the grave. Monasticism is the logical outcome of the Christian doctrine of heaven. The less men should care for this world the greater would be their happiness in heaven. A life of hardship and self-denial here was the currency coined in the mint of selfishness—with which men and women were to purchase crowns of everlasting glory in heaven. The common people were duped by the priesthood, and induced to exchange their earthly possessions for the imaginary possessions of heaven. The Agnostic gospel knows nothing of another world beyond the grave. "One world at a time," is the motto of the Agnostic gospel.

The Agnostic gospel instead of teaching its advocates to despise this world, teaches them to use it, to improve it, to beautify it. The Agnostic gospel is the best antidote to the poison of monasticism. It is the best antidote to that spirit of fanaticism which leads men and women to believe that by catering to the whims of priestcraft they are laying up for themselves treasures in heaven.

The ministers of religion have been preaching for centuries the proud gospel of I-know. The time has come for them to preach the humbler gospel of I-do-not-know. The ministers of religion for centuries have been speaking as familiarly of the plans of God as if they had been admitted into the secret counsels of the most high. The time has come for them to learn the truth that reverence consists in bowing in silent awe in the presence of the Unknowable, and not in making arrogant claims to have fathomed the thoughts of the almighty. The ministers of religion for centuries have been speaking as positively and as arrogantly of the condition of mankind beyond the grave as if they themselves had passed over into the shadowland and returned to tell us what their eyes saw and their ears heard in that realm of mystery. The time has come for them to learn the truth that reverence consists in making an honest confession of ignorance when standing in the presence of death, and not in claiming to gaze behind the vale of the future upon which fate has inscribed the word "unknown." The world is longing for ministers of religion who are bold and honest enough to stand up like men and make a clean breast of their ignorance. The world has been fed long enough on religious dogma. Men and women have been paying out their money long enough to support a ministry that professes to know the unknowable, and fathom the unfathomable. I venture to prophesy that when ministers of religion learn the art of confining their preaching to the sphere of the knowable, they will find their congregations growing larger and not smaller. I would put no restrictions upon psychical research. I shall always be glad to receive any light that future investigation may shed upon the problem of man's existence beyond the grave. But I shall not take opinions for facts; I shall not take sentiment for truth; I shall not take the light of the will-o'-the-wisp for the light of the sun. I believe that if there is any man who is qualified to preach, it is the man who can put away early prejudice and religious sentiment under his feet and follow unimpeded the path of truth. Unitarianism, as I understand it, gives its advocates the largest freedom of thought and speech. It does not hedge in its advocates, as the Christian Register would have us believe, and then say to them: "You may have the largest liberty, only you must not go beyond the limits of this hedge." If the Christian Register has sounded the war cry of Unitarianism, then the time has indeed come for every friend of true progress to leave Unitarianism and work for the organization of a church that shall be free in reality as well as free in name. But the Christian Register does not voice the sentiment of progressive Unitarianism. It voices the sentiment of non-progressive Unitarianism, which, like orthodoxy, is bound to droop and die before the coming of the larger and broader and truer faith. M. W. CHURN, PH.D.,

A Methodist "Ranter" on Lincoln's Religion.

In the New York Christian Advocate of September 7th appears a lengthy editorial under the caption, "Was Abraham Lincoln a Church-member?" During the Ingersoll-Collis controversy last winter concerning Lincoln's religious belief the Advocate, to the surprise of many, denied the claim of General Collis that Lincoln was a church-member and affirmed that he was not.
